

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

3 3433 07489740 0

ONE MAN'S VIEW

LEONARD MERRICK

No subject

NCW
Merrick

E. Crocker

ONE MAN'S VIEW

ONE MAN'S VIEW

By LEONARD MERRICK

AUTHOR OF "VIOLET MOSES" "THE MAN WHO WAS GOOD" "CYNTHIA, A DAUGHTER OF THE PHILISTINES" ETC

16

LONDON: GRANT RICHARDS
9 HENRIETTA STREET
COVENT GARDEN WC

1897

P

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
262662B
ACQUISITION AND TECHNICAL SERVICES
R 1942 L

BUTLER & TANNER,
THE SELWOOD PRINTING WORKS,
FROME, AND LONDON.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

CHAPTER I

THE idea was so foreign to his temperament that Heriot was reluctant to believe that he had entertained it even during a few seconds. He continued his way past the big pink house and the girl on the balcony, surprised at the interest roused in him by this fortuitous discovery of her address. Of what moment was it where she was staying? He had noticed her among the crowd about the band-stand one morning, and admired her. In other words, he had unconsciously attributed to the possessor of a delicious complexion and a pair of grey eyes, darkly fringed, vague characteristics to which she was

Stonehill 6 Dec 1943

I

B

1943

ONE MAN'S VIEW

probably a stranger. He had seen her the next day also, and the next—even hoped to see her ; speculated quite idly what her social position might be, and how she came beside the impossible woman who accompanied her. All that was nothing ; his purpose in coming to Eastbourne was to be trivial. But why the sense of gratification with which he had learnt where she lived ?

As to the idea which had crossed his brain, that was preposterous ! Of course, since the pink house was a boarding establishment, he might, if he would, make her acquaintance by the simple expedient of removing there, but he did not know how he could have meditated such a step. It was the sort of semi-disreputable folly which a man a decade or so younger might commit, and describe as a "lark." No doubt many men a decade or so younger would commit it. He could conceive that a freshly-painted balcony, displaying a pretty girl for an hour or two every afternoon, might serve to extend the clientèle of a boarding-house enormously, and wondered that more attention had not been paid to such a form of advertisement. For himself, however,—his hair was already thinning at the temples; solicitors were deferential to him, and his clerk was taking a villa in Brixton—for himself, it would not do!

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Eastbourne was dreary, he reflected, as he strolled towards the inevitable Wish Tower. He was almost sorry that he had not gone to Fairlawn, and quartered himself on his brother for a week or two instead. Francis was always pleased to meet him of recent years, and no longer remarked early in the conversation that he was "overdrawn at Cox's." On the whole, Francis was not a bad fellow, and Fairlawn and pheasants would have been livelier.

He stifled a yawn, and observed with relief that it was near the dinner-hour. In the evening he turned over the papers in the smoking-room. He perceived, as he often did perceive in the vacations, that he was lonely. Vacations were a mistake: early in one's career one could not afford them, and by the time one was able to do so, the taste for holidays was gone. This hotel was depressing, too. The visitors were dull, and the cooking was indifferent. What could be more tedious than the meal from which he had just risen?—the feeble soup, the flaccid fish, the uninterrupted view of the stout lady with the aquiline nose, and a red shawl across her shoulders. Now he was lolling on a morocco couch, fingering the Field; two or three other men lay about, napping, or looking at the Graphic. There was a great deal of tobacco-smoke, and a little whisky; he might as well have stopped in town, and gone to the club. He wondered what they did in Belle Vue Mansion after dinner. Perhaps there was music, and the girl sang? he could fancy that she sang well. Or they might have impromptu dances? He did not care for dancing personally, but even to see other people enjoying themselves would be comparatively gay. After all, why should he not remove to Belle Vue Mansion if he wished? He had attached a significance to the step that it did not possess, making it appear absurd by the very absurdity of the consideration he accorded it. He remembered the time when he would not have hesitated—those were the days when Francis was always “overdrawn at Cox’s.” Well, he had worked hard since then, and anything that Francis might have lent him had been repaid, and he had gradually acquired soberer views of life. Perhaps he might be said to have gone to an extreme, indeed, and taken the pledge! He sometimes felt old, and he was still in the thirties. Francis was the younger of the two of late, although he had a boy in the Brigade; but elder sons often kept young very long—it was easy for them, like the way of righteousness to a bishop. . . . A waiter cast an inquiring glance round the room, and, crossing to the sofa, handed him a card. Heriot read the name with astonishment; he had not seen the man for sixteen years, and even their irregular correspondence had died a natural death.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“My dear fellow!” he exclaimed in the hall.
“Come inside.”

In the past, of which he had just been thinking, he and Dick Cheriton had been staunch friends, none the less staunch because Cheriton was some years his senior. Dick had a studio in Howland Street then, and was going to set the Academy on fire. In the meanwhile he wore a yellow necktie, and married madly, and smoked a clay pipe; he could not guarantee that he would be an R.A., but at least he was resolved that he would be a Bohemian. He had all the qualifications for artistic success, excepting the talent. When he discovered the fact beyond the possibility of mistake, he accepted a relative's offer of a commercial berth in the United States, and had his hair cut. The valedictory supper in the studio, at which he had renounced ambition, and solemnly burned all his canvases, which the dealers would not buy, had been a very affecting spectacle.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"My dear fellow!" cried Heriot. "Come inside. This is a tremendous pleasure! When did you arrive?"

"Came over in the Germanic, ten days ago. It is you, then! I saw 'George Heriot' in the Visitors' List, and strolled round on the chance. I scarcely hoped— How are you, old man? I'm mighty glad to see you—fact!"

"You've been here ten days?"

"Not here, no; I've only been in Eastbourne a few hours."

"You should have looked me up in town."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I tried. Your chambers were shut."

"Of course ; but the porter at the club——"

"What club? You forget what an exile I am!"

"Have a drink? Well, upon my word, this is very jolly! Sit down ; try one of these!"

"Would you have recognised me?" asked Cheriton, stretching his legs, and lighting up.

"You have changed," admitted Heriot ; "it's a long time. I've changed too."

They regarded each other with a gaze of friendly criticism. Heriot noted with some surprise that the other's appearance savoured little of the American man of business, or of the man of business outside America. His hair, though less disordered than it had been in the Howland Street period, was still rather longer than is customary in the city. It was now grey, and became him admirably. He wore a brown velvet jacket, and showed a glimpse of a loosely tied knot of silk. He no longer looked a Bohemian, but he had acquired the air of a celebrity.

"Have you come home for good, Cheriton?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Cheriton shook his head.

"I guess the States have got me for life," he answered ; " I'm only making a trip. And you ? You're still at the Bar, eh ? "

" Oh, yes," said Heriot drily ; " I'm still at the Bar." (It is not agreeable, when you have succeeded in a profession, to be asked if you belong to it still.) " I've travelled on the lines on which you left me—it doesn't make an exciting narrative. Chambers, court, and bed ! A laundress or two has died in the interval. The thing pays better than it used to do, naturally ; that's all."

" You're doing well ? "

" I should have called it ' doing well ' once ; but we are all Olivers in our hearts. To-day——"

" Mistake ! " said the elder man. " You wanted the Bar—you've got the Bar ; you ought to be satisfied. Now I——"

" Yes ? " said Heriot, as he paused. " How's the world used you, Cheriton ? By the way, you never answered my last letter, I think."

" It was you who didn't answer me."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I fancy not. You were going to Chicago, and I wrote——"

"I wrote after I arrived in Chicago."

"Well, it must be five years ago; we won't argue. What did you do in Chicago, Heriot?"

"No good, sir. I went there with a patent horse-collar. Capital invention—not my own, I never invented anything!—but it didn't catch on. They seemed to take no interest in horse-collars; no money in it, not a cent! After the horse-collar I started in the dry-goods trade; but I was burned out. From Chicago I went to Duluth; I've an hotel there to-day."

"An hotel?"

"That's so. It isn't a distinguished career, running a little hotel, but it's fairly easy. Compared with hustling with horse-collars it's luxurious. Duluth is a hole; but what would you have! I make my way, and that's all I ask now. If I had my life over again——" He sighed. "If we could have our lives over again, eh, Heriot?"

"Humph!" said Heriot doubtfully; he was wondering if he could make any better use of his own—if he would be any livelier the next time he was eight-and-thirty. “I suppose we all blunder, of course.”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“You are a young man yet ; it’s different for you ; and you’re in the profession of your choice : it’s entirely different. We don’t look at the thing from the same standpoint, Heriot.”

“You don’t mean that you regret giving up Art?”

“Sir,” said Cheriton mournfully, “it was the error I shall always regret! I wouldn’t say as much to anybody else ; I keep it here”—he tapped his velvet jacket—“but I had a gift, and I neglected it ; I had power, and—and I run an hotel ! When I reflect, man, there are hours—well, it’s no use crying over spilt milk ; but to think of the position I should have made, and to contrast it with what I am, is bitter.” He swept back his wavy hair impatiently, and in the momentary pose looked more like a celebrity still. Heriot could see that the cherished delusion gave him a melancholy pleasure, and was at a loss how to reply.

“It was up-hill work,” he said at last. “Who can tell ! Luck——”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I was a lad, an impetuous lad ; and I was handicapped—I married!" (The man with a failure to explain is always grateful to have married.) "But I had the stuff in me, I had the temperament. 'Had' it? I have it now! I may keep an hotel, but I shall never be an hotel-keeper. God gave me my soul, sir ; circumstances gave me an hotel. I mayn't paint any more, but an artist by nature I shall always be! I don't say it in any bragging spirit, Heriot ; I should be happier if I didn't feel it. The commonplace man may be contented in the commonplace calling : he fills the rôle he was meant for. It's the poor devil like myself, who knows what he might have been, who suffers!"

Heriot did not pursue the subject ; he puffed his cigar meditatively. After the effervescence subsides, such meetings must always have a little sadness ; he looked at the wrinkles that had gathered in his friend's face, and realized the crow's-feet on his own.

"You lost your wife, you wrote me?" he remarked, breaking a rather lengthy silence.

"In New York, yes—pneumonia. You never married, eh?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"No. Do you stay over here long?"

"A month or two; I can't manage more! But I shall leave my girl in London. I've brought her with me, and she'll remain."

"Of course," said Heriot, "you have a child—of course you have! I remember a little thing tumbling about in Howland Street. She must be a woman, Cheriton?"

"Mamie is twenty-one. I want to see if I can do anything for her before I go back. She loathes Duluth; and she has talent. She'll live with my sister. I don't think you ever saw my sister, did you? She is a widow, and stagnates in Wandsworth—Mamie will be company for her."

"Your daughter paints?"

"No, not paints; she wants to be an actress. I wasn't very keen on it; but she's got the material in her, and I concluded I'd no right to say 'no'. Still, she's not very strong—takes after her mother, I'm afraid, a little; I'd rather she'd had a gift for something else."

"Was it necessary for her to have a gift at all?" asked Heriot, a shade sarcastically. "Couldn't she stop at home?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Well," said Cheriton, "she tried it, but it's a hard thing for a girl like Mamie to content herself with the life in Duluth. There isn't much art in that, Heriot; there isn't much anything. There's the lake, and Superior Street, and the storekeepers lounging in the doorways and spitting on the wooden side-walks. And there's a theatre of a sort—which made her worse. For a girl panting to be famous, Duluth is a hell. She's been breaking her heart in it ever since she was sixteen; and after all, it's in the blood. It would have been odd if my daughter hadn't had the artistic temperament, I suppose!"

"I suppose it would," said Heriot. "Well, why doesn't she go on the stage in America? I shouldn't think she'd find it easy here."

"She wouldn't find it easy there. There's no stock company in Duluth; only the travelling companies come sometimes for a few nights. There's no bigger opportunity for her on the other side than on this. Besides, she wants the English stage. I wonder if you know anybody who could give her any introductions?"

"I?" said Heriot; "not a soul!"

"I'm sorry to hear you say that," replied

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Cheriton blankly ; " I was counting on you some! "

Heriot looked at him.

" You counted on me! " he said ; " for Heaven's sake, why ? "

" Well, I don't know many people over here to-day, you see ; the fellows I used to knock against have died, gone to the Colonies—fizzled out. You were solid ; and you were a swell, with connections and all that ! I understand the stage has become very fashionable in London—I thought you might meet actor-managers at dinners and fêtes and blessed things. That was the idea ; I daresay it was very stupid, but I had it. I mentioned your name to Mamie as soon as it was settled we should come. However, we'll fix the matter somehow."

" I'm sorry to prove a disappointment," said Heriot. " Tell your daughter so for me. I'd do what you want with pleasure, if I were able. You know that, I'm sure ? "

" Oh, I know that," said Cheriton ; " it can't be helped. Yes, I'll tell her. She will be disappointed, of course ; she understands how difficult the thing is without influence, and I've talked about you a lot."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Do you think you were wise to—to——"

"Oh, it was a mistake as it turns out."

"I don't mean that only. I mean, do you think you were wise to encourage her hopes in such a direction at all? Frankly, if I had a daughter—— Forgive me for speaking plainly."

"My dear fellow! your daughter and mine! —their paths would be as wide apart as the Poles. And you don't know Mamie!"

"At all events I know that the stage is more overcrowded every year. Most girls are stage-struck at some time or other; and there are hundreds of actresses who can't earn bread-and-cheese. A man I know has his type-writing done by a woman who used to be on the stage. She played the best parts in the country, I believe, and, I daresay, nursed the expectation of becoming a Bernhardt. She gets a pound a week in his office, he tells me, and was thankful to obtain the post!"

"Mamie is bound to come to the front. She's got it—she's an artist born! I tell you, I should be brutal to stand in the way of her career ; the girl is pining, really pining, for distinction. When you've talked to her you'll change your views."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Perhaps," said Heriot, as the shortest way of ending the discussion ; "very likely I'm wrong!" The budding genius bored him. "Mind you explain to the young lady that my inability, and not my will, refuses, at any rate."

"That's all right," declared Cheriton, getting up. "I told her I was coming round to see if it was you." He laughed. "She's picturing me coming back with a bushel of letters of introduction from you by now, I'll bet! Well, I must be going ; it's getting late."

"You brought her down to Eastbourne to-day?"

"Oh, I've been dangling about town a little by myself ; Mamie and my sister have been here a week. Good-night, old chap ; shall I see you to-morrow? You might give us a look in if you will—say in the afternoon. Belle Vue Mansion ; don't forget!"

"Where?" exclaimed Heriot, startled into interest.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Belle Vue Mansion," repeated Cheriton, gripping his hand. "You can't miss it: a big pink house on the Esplanade."

CHAPTER II

HERIOT betook himself there on the following day with a curious eagerness. If the girl he had noticed should prove to be Cheriton's daughter, how odd it would be! He at once hoped for the coincidence, and found the possibility a shade pathetic. It emphasized his years to think that the ill-kept child of the dirty studio might have become the girl he had admired. His progress during the interval appeared momentarily insignificant to him; he felt that while a brat became a woman he ought to have done much more. He was discouraged to reflect that he had not taken silk; for he had always intended to take silk, and had small misgivings that he would have cause to repent it. His practice had indicated for some time that he would not suffer by the step, and yet he had delayed his application. His motto had been, "Slow and Sure," but it seemed to him suddenly that he had been too slow; his income as a Junior should not have contented him so long.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He pulled the bell, and was preceded up the stairs by a maid-servant, who opened a door, and announced him to the one occupant of the room. Heriot saw that she was the girl of the balcony and the Parade, and that she moved towards him smiling. In the instant of his anticipation being confirmed, the coincidence looked stranger to him still.

"I am Mamie Cheriton," she said. "My father is expecting you."

Her intonation was faintly American, but her voice was full and sweet. He took her hand with singular pleasure, and a touch of excitement that did not concord with his countenance, which was formal and impassive.

"I am glad to make your acquaintance, Miss Cheriton."

"Won't you sit down?" she said. "He will be here in a minute."

Heriot took a seat, and decided that her eyes were even lovelier than he had known.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"When I saw you last, you were a child," he remarked inaccurately.

"Yes; it must have astonished you meeting my father again after so many years. It was funny your being here, wasn't it? . . . But perhaps you often come to Eastbourne?"

"No," said Heriot, "no, I don't often come. How does it strike you, Miss Cheriton? I suppose you can hardly remember England, can you?"

"Well, I shan't be sorry to be settled in London. It was London I was anxious to go to, not a seaside resort . . . Do you say 'seaside resort' in Europe, or is it wrong? When I said 'seaside resort' this morning, I noticed that a woman stared at me."

"One generally says a 'watering-place' over here," he admitted; "I don't know that it's important."

"Well, a 'watering-place' then. A watering-place was my aunt's wish. Well—— Well, I'm saying 'well' too often, I guess?—that's American, too! I've got to be quite English—that's my first step. But at least I don't talk through my nose, Mr. Heriot, do I?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"You talk very delightfully, I think," he said, taken aback.

"I hope you mean it! My voice is most important, you know. It would be very cruel that I should be handicapped in my own country by having a foreigner's voice. I shall have difficulties enough without!"

"I'm afraid," he said, "that I'm unfortunate. I wish I could have done something to further the ambitions your father mentioned."

She smiled again, rather wistfully this time.

"They seem very absurd to you, I dare say?"

He murmured deprecation: "Why?"

"The stage-struck girl is always absurd."

Recognising his own phrase, he perceived that he had been too faithfully reported, and was embarrassed.

"I fear I spoke hastily. In the abstract the stage-struck girl may be absurd, but so is a premature opinion."

"Thank you!" she said. "But why 'stage-struck,' anyhow? it's a term I hate. I suppose you wanted to be a barrister, Mr. Heriot?"

"I did," he confessed, "certainly. There are a great many, but I thought there was room for one more."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"But you weren't described as 'bar-struck'?"

"I don't think I ever heard the expression."

"It would be a very foolish one?"

"It would sound so to me."

"Why 'stage-struck' then? Is it any more ridiculous to aspire to one profession than another? You don't say a person is 'paint-struck,' or 'ink-struck,' or anything else '-struck'; why the sneer when one is drawn towards the theatre? But perhaps no form of art appears to you necessary?"

"I think I should prefer to call it 'desirable,' since you ask the question," he said. "And 'art' is a word used to weight a great many trivialities too! Everybody who writes a novel is an artist in his own estimation, and, personally, I find existence quite possible without novels."

"Did you ever read Mademoiselle de Maupin?" asked Miss Cheriton.

"Have you?" he said quickly.

"Oh, yes; books are very cheap in America.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

'I would rather grow roses than potatoes,' is one of the lines in the preface. You would rather grow potatoes than roses, eh?"

"You are an enthusiast," said Heriot; "I see!" He pitied her for being Dick Cheriton's daughter. She was inevitable: the pseudo-artist's discontent with realities—the inherited tendencies, fanned by thinly-veiled approval! He understood.

Cheriton came in after a few minutes, followed by the aunt, to whom Heriot was introduced. He found her primitive, and far less educated than her brother. She was very happy to see dear Dick again, and she was sorry that she must lose him again so soon. Dear Mamie, though, would be a consolation. A third-rate suburban villa was stamped upon her; he could imagine her making ghastly antimacassars for horse-hair armchairs, and that a visit to an Eastbourne boarding-house was the event of her life. She wore jet earrings, and poured her tea into the saucer. With the circulation of the tea, strangers drifted into the room, and the conversation was continued in undertones.

"Have you been talking to Mamie about her intentions?" Cheriton inquired.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"We've been chatting, yes. What steps do you mean to take, Miss Cheriton? What shall you do?"

"I propose to go to the dramatic agents," she said, "and ask them to hear me recite."

"Dramatic agents must be kept fairly busy, I should say. What if they don't consent?"

"I shall recite to them."

"You are firm!" he laughed.

"I am eager, Mr. Heriot. I have longed till I am sick with longing. London has been my aim since I was a little girl. I have dreamt of it! — I've gone to sleep hoping that I might. I couldn't recall one of its streets, but in dreams I've reached it over and over again! The way was generally across Lincoln Park, in Chicago; and all of a sudden I was among theatres and lights, and it was London!"

"And you were an actress! And the audience showered bouquets!"

"I always woke up before I was an actress. But now I'm here really, I mean to try to wake London up."

"I hope you will," he said. Her faith in herself was a little infectious, since she was beautiful. If she had been plain, he would have considered her conceited.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“Have I gushed?” she said, colouring.

He was not sure but what she had.

“She’s like her father,” said Cheriton gaily; “get her on the subject of Art, and her tongue runs away with her. We’re all children, we artists—up in the skies, or down in the dumps. No medium with us! She must recite to you one of these days, Heriot; I want you to hear her.”

“Will you, Miss Cheriton?”

“If you like,” she said.

“Dear Mamie must recite to me,” murmured Mrs. Baines; “I’m quite looking forward to it! What sort of pieces do you say, dear? Nice pieces?”

“She knows the parts of Juliet, and Rosalind, and Pauline by heart,” said Cheriton, ignoring his sister. “I think you’ll say her Balcony Scene is almost as fine a rendering as you’ve ever heard. There’s a delicacy, a spiritual——”

“Has she been trained?” asked Heriot; “I understood she was quite a novice.”

“I’ve coached her myself,” replied Cheriton

ONE MAN'S VIEW

complacently. "I don't pretend to be an elocutionist, of course; but I've been able to give her some hints. All the arts are related, you know, my boy—it's only a difference in the form of expression! They are playing Romeo and Juliet at the theatre here to-night, and we're going; she never loses an opportunity for study. It's been said that you can learn as much by watching bad acting as good! Will you come with us?" he added, lowering his voice. "You'll see how she warms up at the sight of the footlights."

"I don't mind," said Heriot, "if I shan't be in the way. Suppose we all dine together at the hotel, and go on from there? What do you say? He turned to the ladies, and the widow faltered:

"Lor! I'm sure it's very kind of you to invite me, Mr. Heriot. That would be gay, wouldn't it!"

She smoothed her flat hair tremulously, and left the decision to her brother and her niece.

Heriot took his leave with the understanding that he was to expect them, and sauntered along the Parade more cheerfully than was his wont. The girl had not failed to impress him, though he disapproved of her tendencies ; nor did these appear quite so preposterous to him now, albeit he thought them regrettable. He did not know whether he believed in her or not yet, but he was conscious that he wished to do so. His paramount reflection was that she would have been a wholly charming girl if she had had ordinary advantages—a finishing governess, and a London season, and a touch of conventionality. He disliked to use the word “conventionality,” for it sounded priggish ; but “conventionality” was what he meant.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

At dinner, however, and more especially after it, he forgot his objections. In the theatre he watched Miss Cheriton more attentively than the stage. She herself sat with her eyes rivetted on it, and he could see that she was the prey to strong excitement. He wondered whether this was created by the performance, which seemed to him indifferent, or by the thoughts that it awoke, and resolved that he would ask her. When the curtain fell, and they issued into the street, he was not sorry that Cheriton derided his suggestion of a cab, and declared that the walk back would be agreeable. He kept by the girl's side, and the others followed.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

She did not speak, and after a minute he said :

"Will it jar upon you if I say, 'Let us talk'?"

She turned to him with a slight start.

"Of course not! How can you think me so ridiculous?"

"Yet it did!" said Heriot; "I could see."

"I know exactly how I appear," she said constrainedly. "I look an affected idiot. If you knew how I hate to appear affected! I give you my word I don't put it on; I can't help it! The theatre gives me hot and cold shivers, and turns me inside out. That isn't prettily expressed, but it describes what I mean as nearly as possible. Am I 'enthusing' again?"

"I never said you 'enthused' before. You're not my idea of—of 'the gushing girl' at all."

"I'm glad to hear it. I was very ashamed when you had gone this afternoon." She hesi-tated painfully. "I wish I could explain myself, but I can't—without a pen. I can write what I feel much better than I can say it. I began to write a play once, and the girl said what I felt perfectly. It was a bad play, but a big relief. I've sometimes thought that if I walked about with a pen in my hand, I should be a good conversationalist."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Try to tell me what you feel without one," said Heriot.

"You encourage me to bore you! Mr. Heriot, I yearn, I crave, to do something clever. It isn't only vanity: half the craving is born of the desire to live among clever people. Ever since I can remember, I've ached to know artists, and actors, and people who write and do things. I've been cooped among storekeepers without an idea in their heads; I've never seen a man or woman of talent in my life, excepting my father; I've never heard anybody speak who knew what art or ambition meant. You may laugh, but if I had it, I would give five hundred dollars to go home with some of those actresses to-night, and sit mum in a corner, and listen to them!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“Don't you think it very likely you might be disappointed?” he asked.

“I don't! I don't expect they would talk blank-verse at supper, but they would talk of their work, of their hopes. An artist must be an artist always—on the stage, or off it; in his studio, or in his club. My father is an instance: he could not be a Philistine if he tried. He once said something I've always remembered. He said: ‘God gave me my soul, child; circumstances gave me an hotel.’ I thought it happily put.”

Heriot perceived that Cheriton had thought so too, since he had repeated the “impromptu” to himself.

“What a different world we should have lived in by now if he had kept in his profession!” she exclaimed. “I quiver when I realize what I've missed! People I only know through their books, or the newspapers, would have been familiar friends. I should have seen Swinburne smoking cigars in our parlour; and Sarah Bernhardt would have dropped in to tea, and chatted about the rehearsal she had just left, and showed me the patterns of the new costumes she was ordering. Isn't it wonderful?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

In sympathy for her he said :

"It is possible your father might have remained in England, and still not have become intimate with celebrities."

She looked doubtful. "Even if he hadn't—and one likes to believe in one's own father, Mr. Heriot—the atmosphere would have been right. They mightn't have been Swinburnes and Bernhards that were at home in our place—they might have been people the world hasn't heard of yet. But they would have talked of the time when the world was going to hear of them. One can respect an obscure genius as much as a famous one."

They had reached the door of Belle Vue Mansion ; and when he was begged to go in for half an hour, Heriot did not demur. They had the drawing-room to themselves now, and Cheriton descanted with relish on the qualifications necessary to make a successful actress. He had no knowledge of the subject, but possessed great fluency, and he spoke of "broad effects," and "communicable emotion," and “what he might call a matter of perspective” with an authority which came near to disguising the fact that there was little or no meaning in what he said. The girl sat pale and attentive, and Mrs. Baines listened vaguely, as she might have done to a discourse in Choctaw. Relatives who came back from abroad, and invited her to stay with them in a house where she cost two guineas a week, must be treated with deference ; but the stage and the circus were of equal significance to her mind, and she would have simpered just as placidly if her niece had been anxious to jump through a hoop. Her chief emotion was pride at being in a room with a barrister who, she had learnt, was the brother of a baronet ; and she watched him furtively, with the anticipation of describing the event in Lavender Street, Wandsworth, where the magnate was a gentleman who travelled in a brougham, and haberdashery.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“Would it be inconsiderate to ask you to recite to-night, Miss Cheriton ?” inquired Heriot. “Don’t, if you are too tired.”

She rose at once, as if compelling herself to subdue reluctance, and moved towards the bay of the window slowly. For a second or two after she stood there she did not speak, only her lips trembled. Then she began Portia's speech on Mercy. In recitation her voice had the slight tremolo which is natural to many beginners who feel deeply; but its quality was delicious, and her obvious earnestness was not without effect. Conscious that her gestures were stiff, she had chosen a speech that demanded little action, and it was not until she came to "Therefore, Jew, though justice be thy plea," that her hands, which she had clasped lightly in front of her, fell apart. With the change of position she seemed to acquire a dignity and confidence that made the climax triumphant, and though Heriot could see that she had much to learn, his compliments were sincere.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

7 When he bade her good-night, she looked at him appealingly.

"Tell me the truth!" she said under her breath; "I've only had my father's opinion Tell me the truth!"

"I honestly believe you're clever," he answered. "I'm sure of it!" He felt his words to be very cold compared with the sympathy that was stirring in him.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The proprietress, who had entered, hovered about with an eye on the gas, and he repeated his adieux hurriedly. The interest he already took in the question of Miss Cheriton's success surprised him. The day had had a charm that was new, and he found that he was eagerly anticipating the morrow.

CHAPTER III

ON the pavements of the Strand the snow had turned to slush ; and from the river a fog was blowing up, which got into the girl's throat, and made her cough. She mounted a flight of gloomy stairs, and pulled a bell. Already her bearing had lost something that had distinguished it in the summer : something of courage. She rang the bell deprecatingly, as if ashamed.

The anteroom into which she passed had become painfully familiar to her, like the faces of many of the occupants. They all wore the same expression—an air of repressed eagerness : of diffidence striving to look assured. The walls were covered with theatrical photographs, and in a corner a pimply youth sat writing at a table. What he wrote nobody knew or cared. The crowd had but one thought—the door that communicated with the agent's private office, to which they prayed, though they were no longer sanguine, that they would gain admission. It was four o'clock, and at five the office would close. There were so many of them, it was impossible that Mr. Passmore could interview everybody. Which would be lucky to-day?

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Mamie also looked towards the door, and from the door back to her companions in distress. A little fair woman in a light fawn costume—terribly incongruous to the season, but her least shabby—met her eyes and spoke.

“Have you got an appointment?” she asked in a low voice.

“No.”

“Oh, then you won't see him,” said the little woman more cheerfully. “I thought as you'd come in so late that you had an appointment. I've been here since twelve.”

The door opened, and Mr. Passmore appeared on the threshold. He did not say “good-afternoon” to his clients; he cast an indifferent gaze round the room, and signed to a cadaverous man who sat sucking the handle of his umbrella.

“Here! You!” he said, retiring again. The cadaverous man rose hurriedly, among envious glances, and twenty-five heads that had been lifted in expectation drooped dejectedly afresh. The men whose watches were not pawned looked to see the time.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"What's your line?" said the little woman, addressing Mamie once more.

"I beg your pardon? Oh, I'm trying for my first engagement; I haven't acted yet at all."

The other showed surprise and some contempt.

"A novice, are you! Good Lord, it's no good your coming to the agents, my dear; they can't find shops for us!"

"I paid Mr. Passmore the usual fee," said Mamie; "he promised he'd do what he could."

The little woman smiled, and turned her shoulder to her, declining further discussion. Another girl rang the bell, but withdrew with a sigh as she perceived the futility of waiting. The cadaverous man came out, with "an engagement" writ large upon his features. He stowed a type-written "part" into the pocket of his overcoat, and nodded a farewell to an acquaintance, whose cast of countenance proclaimed him a low comedian.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Got anything, dear boy?" inquired the latter in a husky whisper.

"They want me for the White Slaves Company—the Father! Offered four. Of course I refused point-blank. 'No,' I said, 'six.' 'Oh,' he said, 'impossible!' I wouldn't budge; what do you think! Why, I had eight with Kavanagh, and she's as good as booked me for her next tour. 'I don't mind,' I said; 'I'll go to the Harcourts!' They've been trying to get me back, and he knows it. 'Don't do that,' he said; 'say five, my boy!' 'Six!' I said, 'and I only take it then to fill in.' 'Well, they want you,' he said; 'you're the only man for the part, and I suppose you've got to have your own terms; but they wouldn't pay it to anybody else!'" (His salary was to be three pounds ten, and he could have shed tears of relief to get it.)

"Damn fine, old chap!" said the low comedian, who didn't believe a word. "Is the comedy part open, do you know? I might——"

"Don't think so; fancy they're complete." His manner was already condescending. "'Olive oil!'"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Now, I can't see you people to-day," exclaimed Mr. Passmore, putting up his hands impatiently. "No good, Miss Forbes," as a girl made a dart towards him with a nervous smile that was meant to be ingratiating; "got nothing for you, it's no use! . . . What do you want, my dear?"

Another lady, who found it embarrassing to explain her anxiety in public, faltered that she had just looked in to hear if Mr. Passmore could kindly——"

"Nothing doing! perhaps later on. I'll let you know."

"You will bear me in mind, won't you, Mr. Passmore?" she pleaded.

"What?" he said. "Oh, yes, yes; I'll drop you a postcard—I won't forget you. Good-day." He did not even recollect her name!

"Can I speak to you, Mr. Passmore?" said Mamie, rising.

"You?" he said questioningly. "Oh, I can't do anything for you yet! Everything's made up—things are very quiet just now. . . . Here, Miss Beaumont, I want a word with you."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Give me a minute," persisted Mamie. "I want an engagement ; I don't care how small the part is. I'll be a servant, I'll be anything, I want a beginning ! I recited to you, if you remember, and——"

"Did you ?" he said. "Oh, yes, yes, I remember—very nice. You wanted to play 'Juliet' !" He laughed.

"I'll be anything !" she said again. "I'll give you double the commission if——"

"Have you got enough voice for chorus ?" he asked testily. "How are your limbs ?"

"I want to be an actress," she said, flushing. "I mean to work !"

"Come on, Miss Beaumont !" he cried. And Miss Beaumont swept past her into the sanctum.

The girl who six months ago had looked forward to playing "Juliet" made her way down the dingy staircase drearily. This was but one of the many dramatic agents with whom she had gone through the form of registering her name. Mr. Passmore's booking-fee had been five shillings ; most of the others' booking-fee had been five shillings ; one had charged a guinea. All alike had been affable on her first visit, and forgotten who she was when she paid her second ; all had been reminded who she was on her second, and failed to recognise her again upon her third. She called on one or another of them every day, and contrived to gain such an interview as she had just had about once a week. She had taken in the theatrical papers and replied to shoals of advertisements, but as she had to state she was a novice, nobody ever took any notice of her applications. She had haunted the stage-doors when she read that a new piece was to be produced, and begged in vain to be allowed to see the manager. She had, in fine, done everything that was possible, and she was as far from securing an engagement as on the day that she arrived in England. And she had talent, and she was beautiful, and was prepared to commence upon the lowest rung of the ladder.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The Stage is generally supposed to be the easiest of all callings to enter. The girl who is unhappy at home, the boy who has been plucked for the army, the woman whose husband has failed on the Stock Exchange, all speak of "going on the stage" as calmly as if it were only necessary to take a stroll to get there. As a matter of fact, unless an extraordinary piece of fortune befall her, it is almost as difficult for a girl without influence, or a good deal of money, to become an actress as it is for her to marry a duke. She may be in earnest, but there are thousands who are in earnest ; she may be pretty, but there are hundreds of pretty actresses struggling and unrecognised ; she may be a genius, but she has no opportunity to display her gift until the engagement is obtained. And this is the tremendous obstacle. She can prove nothing ; she can only say, " I feel I should succeed." If she is allowed to recite—and it is very rarely that she is—a recital is little or no test of her qualifications for the boards. She may recite superbly, and as an actress be very indifferent. She has to beg to be taken on trust, while myriad women, eager for the vacant part, can cry, " I can refer you to so-and-so ; I have experience !" Though other artistic professions may be as hard to rise in, there is probably none other in which it is quite so difficult to make the first steps. If a girl is able to write, she can sit alone in her bedroom, and demonstrate her capability; if she can paint, her canvases speak for her; if she pants to be a prima donna, she can open her mouth, and people hear her sing. The would-be actress, alone among artists, can do nothing to show her fitness for the desired vocation until her self-estimate has been blindly accepted—and she may easily fail to do herself justice then, cast as she will be for minor rôles entirely foreign to her bent.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

ONE MAN'S VIEW

To succeed on the stage requires indomitable energy, callousness to rebuffs, tact, luck, talent, and facilities for living six or nine months out of the year without earning a shilling. To get on to the stage requires valuable introductions or considerable means. If a woman has neither, the chances are in favour of her seeking a commencement vainly all her life. And as to a young man so situated who seeks it, he is endeavouring to pass through a brick wall.

Mamie descended the dingy staircase, and at the foot she saw the girl who had been addressed as "Miss Forbes." She was standing on the doorstep, gathering up her skirts. It had commenced to snow again, and she contemplated the dark, damp street shrinkingly. An impulse seized Mamie to speak as she passed. From such trifles great things sometimes followed, she remembered. She was at the age when the possibility of the happy accident recurs to the mind constantly—a will-o'-the-wisp that lightens the gloom. The reflection takes marvellous forms, and at twenty-one the famous actor—of the aspirant's imagination—who goes about the world crying, "A genius! you must come to me!" may be met in any omnibus. The famous actor of the aspirant's imagination is like the editor as conceived by the general public: he spends his life in quest of obscure ability.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"If we're going the same way, I can offer you a share of my umbrella," she said.

"Oh, thanks!" said the girl in a slightly surprised voice; "I'm going to Charing Cross."

"And I'm going to Victoria, so our road is the same," said Mamie.

A feeling of passionate pleasure suffused her as she moved away by the girl's side through the yellow fog. The roar of the Strand had momentarily the music of her dreams while she yearned in Duluth, and the greatness of the city—the London of theatres, Art, and books—throbbed in her veins. She was walking with an actress!

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“Isn't it beastly?” said the girl. “I suppose you've got to train it?”

“Yes; I'm living in Wandsworth. Have you far to go?”

“Notting Hill. I take the 'bus. Passmore hadn't got anything for you, had he?”

Mamie shook her head. “We were both unlucky; but perhaps it doesn't matter so much to you?”

“Doesn't it! . . . Have you been on his books long, Miss —?”

“Miss Cheriton—Mamie Cheriton.”

“That's a good name; it sounds like a character in a play—as if she'd have a love-scene under the apple-blossom! Where were you last?”

“At Mr. Faulkner's; but he didn't know of any vacancy either.”

“I don't mean that,” said Miss Forbes; “I mean, how long have you been 'out'?”

“Oh,” answered Mamie, “I left home at one o'clock ; that's the worst of living such a long way off ! ”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The other stared.

“ Don't you understand ? ” she exclaimed. “ I mean, what Company were you in last, and when did it finish ? ”

“ Oh, I see, ” stammered Mamie. “ I'm sorry to say I've everything in front of me ! I've never had a part yet at all. I'm that awful thing—a novice. ” “ Crumbs ! ” said Miss Forbes.

“ I guess you actresses look down on novices rather ? ”

“ Well, the profession is full enough already, goodness knows ! Still, I suppose we've all got a right to begin. I don't mind a novice who goes to the agents in the snow ; it shows she means business anyhow. It's the amateurs who go to the managers in hansoms that I hate. But it's an awful struggle, my dear, take my word for it ; you'd better stop at home if you can afford to ! And Passmore will never be any use to you. Look at me ! I've been going to him for four months ; and I played ‘ Prince Arthur ’ on tour with Sullivan when I was nine. ”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I am looking at you," said Mamie, smiling, "and envying you till I'm ill. You say Passmore is no use: let me into a secret. What can I do to get an engagement?"

"Blessed if I know, if you haven't got any friends to pull the strings. I'd like to know the secret myself! Well," she broke off, "perhaps we shall meet again. I must say 'good-evening' here; there's my 'bus."

"Don't go yet!" begged Mamie. "Won't you come and have some tea first?"

Miss Forbes hesitated eloquently.

"I shall get tea when I reach home," she murmured, "and I'm rather late."

"Oh, let me invite an actress to tea. Do, please! It will be the next best thing to getting a part."

"You're very kind. I don't mind, I'm sure. There's a place close by where they give you a pot for two for fourpence. You're American, aren't you?"

"I've lived in America; I'm English really."

They entered the establishment referred to, and seated themselves at a table. Mamie ordered a pot of tea and muffins.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"It's nice and warm in here!" she said.

"Isn't it! I noticed you in the office. My name is Mabel Forbes; but I daresay you heard Passmore speak to me?"

"Yes; he didn't speak very nicely, did he?"

"They never do; they're all alike. They know we can't do without them, and they treat us like dirt. I tell you, it's awful; you don't know what you're letting yourself in for, my dear!"

"To succeed I'd bear anything, all the snubs and drudgery imaginable. I do know; I know it's not to be avoided. I've read the biographies of so many great actresses. I should think of the future—the reward. I'd set my teeth and live for that time; and I'd work for it morning, noon, and night."

"It would do me good to live with you if we were on tour together," said Miss Forbes cheerfully; "you'd keep my pecker up, I think! I loathe sharing diggings with another girl, as a rule—one always quarrels with her, and, with the same bedroom, one has nowhere to go and cry. After they've been in the profession a few years they don't talk like you. Not that there's really much in it," she added with a sigh. "To set your teeth, and work morning, noon, and night sounds very fine, but what does it amount to? It means you'd get two-ten a week, and study leading business on the quiet till you thought you were as good as Ellen Terry. But if nobody made you an offer, what then?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"You mean it's possible to be really clever, and yet not to come to the front?" asked Mamie earnestly.

"How can you come to the front if no one gives you the opportunity? You may be liked where you are—in what you're doing—but you can't play 'lead' in London, unless a London manager offers you an engagement to play 'lead,' can you? You can't make him. Do you suppose the only clever actresses alive are those who are known? Besides, if leading business is what you are thinking of, I don't believe you've the physique for it; you don't look strong enough. I should have thought light comedy was more your line."

"It isn't. If I'm meant for anything, it's for drama, and—and tragedy. But I'd begin in the smallest capacity, and be grateful. The ideas I had when I came to London have been knocked out of me—and they were moderate enough, too! I'd begin by saying that the dinner was ready. Surely it can't be so difficult to get an opening like that, if one knows the way to go about it?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Well, look here, my dear. I played 'Prince Arthur' with Sullivan when I was nine, as I tell you, and I've been in the profession ever since. But I've been out of an engagement four months now. All I could save out of my last screw has gone in 'bus fares and stamps; and my people haven't got any more money than they know how to spend. If an engagement to announce the dinner had been offered me to-day, I'd have taken it; and I'd be going back to Notting Hill happy."

"I'm awfully sorry," said Mamie sympathetically. "Shall we have another muffin?"

"No, I don't want any more, thanks. But you've no idea what a business it is. I've got talent and experience, and I'm not bad-looking, and yet you see how I've got to struggle. One is always too late everywhere! I was at the Queen's this morning. There are always any number of small parts in the Queen's things, you know, and I thought there might be a chance for The Pride of the Troop. They'd got everybody except the extra-ladies. By the way, you might try to get on at the Queen's as an extra, if you like. With your appearance you'd have a very good chance, I should say."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Mamie felt her heart stirring feverishly. "Do you mean it?" she asked. "What are 'extras'—you don't mean 'supers'?"

"Oh, they're better than supers—different class, you know. Of course they've nothing to say excepting in chorus. They come on in the Race Course scene and the Ball-room, and look nice. They wear swagger frocks—the management finds their dresses—and are supposed to murmur, and laugh, and act in dumb-show in the background. You know! They're frightful fools—a girl who could act a bit would stand out among extra-ladies like a Bernhardt at the Ladbroke Hall!"

"If they would take me," said Mamie, clasping her hands; "if they would only take me! Do you really think they will?"

"It couldn't hurt to try. Ask for Mr. Casey and tell him you want to 'walk on.' There, I've given you a hint after all," she exclaimed, as she got up; "one can't think of everything right off! It might prove a start for you; who knows? If Casey sees you're intelligent, he may give you a line or two to speak. You go up to one of the principals, and say, 'Lord Tomnoddy, where's that bracelet you promised to send me when I saw you at Kempton Park?' Then the low-comedy merchant—it's generally the low-comedy merchant you speak to—says something that gets a laugh, and bustles up the stage, and you run after him angrily. But don't be sanguine, even of getting on as an extra! There's always a crowd of women besieging the Queen's at every production—you won't be the only pretty one. Well, I must be going, my dear. I wish you luck!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"And luck to you!" said Mamie, squeezing her hand gratefully; "and many, many thanks! I look forward to telling you the result. I suppose we're sure to see each other at Mr. Passmore's?"

"Oh, we're bound to run against each other somewhere before long!" returned Miss Forbes cordially. "Yes, I shall be curious to hear what you do ; I've enjoyed our chat very much. Take care of yourself!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

She hurried towards her 'bus, waving an "au revoir," and Mamie crossed the road. London widened between the girls—and their paths in it never met again.

CHAPTER IV

AS she reached the opposite pavement Heriot exclaimed: "Miss Cheriton! Are you going to cut me?"

"You?" she cried with surprise. "It was—it was the fog's fault; I didn't see. What a stranger you are! it's a fortnight since you came out to us. A 'fortnight,' you observe—I'm 'quite English, you know,' now."

"You're in good spirits," he said. "What have you been doing?"

"I've been rising in my career," she answered gaily. "I have had tea in a cakeshop with an actress! I have just shaken hands with her; she has just given me a piece of advice. I am, in imagination, already a personage!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Who is she?" asked Heriot. "Where does she come from? . . . Let me see you to Victoria, I suppose that's where you are going?"

He stopped a hansom, and scrutinized her sadly as they took their seats. "Have you been out in this weather long?" he said. "You poor child, how wet you must be! Well, you know an actress! Am I not to be told all about it?"

She was as voluble as he wished; he had become in the last few months her confidant and consoler. Lavender Street, Wandsworth, or those residents who commanded a view of No. 20, had learnt to know his figure well. Awhile ago he had marvelled at the rôle he was filling; latterly he had ceased to marvel. He realized the explanation—and as he listened to the tale her words smote him. It hurt him to think of the girl beside him cringing to a theatrical agent, forming a chance acquaintance in the streets, and contemplating so ignoble a position as the one of which she spoke. He looked at her yearningly.

"You are not pleased," she said.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Is there a great deal to be pleased at? Is this sort of thing worthy of you?"

"It is the first step. Oh, be nice about it, do! If you understood—can I be a Juliet at once! If I am to succeed——"

"I have sympathised with you," he said; "I've entered into your feelings; I do understand! But you don't know what you're meditating. Admitting it's inevitable—admitting, if you're to be an actress, that you must begin, since you've no influence, where you're content to begin—can you bear it? These women you'll be thrown amongst——"

"Some at least," she said, "will surely be like myself! I am not the only girl who has to begin at the bottom! And if . . . whatever they are, it can't be helped. Remember, I'm in earnest! I talked at first wildly; I see how childish I was. What should I be if I faltered because the path isn't strewn with roses? An actress must be satisfied to work."

"It is not decreed that you need be an actress," answered Heriot. "After all, there is no necessity to fight for subsistence. If you were compelled——"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"There are other compelling forces than poverty. Can't you recognise ambition?"

"Haven't I?" he said. "Have I been wood?"

"Ah!" she smiled, "forgive me! I didn't mean that. But be nice still! Am I to reject a career because I'm not starving? I'm starving with my soul! I'm like a poor mute battling for voice. I want—I want to give expression to what I feel within me." She beat her hands in her lap. "I'm willing to struggle—eager to! You've always known it! Why do you disappoint me now? I have to begin even lower than I understood, that's all. And what is it? I shall be surrounded by artists then! By degrees I shall rise. 'You are in the right way, but remember what I say, Study, study, study! Study well, and God bless you!' Do you know who said that?—Mrs. Siddons to Macready. It was at Newcastle, and it was about her performance the same night that he wrote: 'The violence of her emotion seemed beyond her power longer to endure, and the words, faintly articulated, "Was he alive?" sent an electric thrill through the audience.' Think what that means ; three words ! I can't do it, I've tried—oh, how I've tried ! For months after I read that book, I used to say them dozens of times every day, with every intonation I could think of. But there was no effect, no thrill even to myself. 'Study, study, study ! Keep your mind on your art, do not remit your study, and you are certain to succeed !' I will keep my mind on it, I'll obey her advice, I will succeed ! Heaven couldn't be so cruel as to let me fail after putting such longings into me !”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Heriot sighed. The impulse to tell her that he loved her, to keep her to himself, was mastering him. Never before had her hold on him been displayed so vividly, nor had the temptation to throw prudence to the winds been quite so strong.

“If you had a happier home,” he said, “there would be other influences. Don't think me impertinent, but it can't be very lively for you in that house.”

“It isn't a whirl of gaiety, and Aunt Lydia is not ideal ! But—but I was just the same in Duluth.”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Duluth!" he echoed; "it was dreary in Duluth, too."

"At all events I had my father there."

"What does he write?" asked Heriot. "Have you had a letter since I saw you?"

"He gives no news. The news is to come from me."

"I think there's a little," he said; "I can tell it by your tone."

"It's cheerful to be with some one who can tell things by one's tone. Well, he thinks, if I can't make a commencement, that I may as well go back."

"I see," he said. "I won't ask you if you mean to."

She laughed a shade defiantly. "Duluth has many charms. I've been remembering them since his letter! There is my father, and there's strawberry-shortcake. My father will be disappointed in me if I have to go; the strawberry-shortcake—well, there's a tiny shop there where they sell it hot. I've never seen it hot anywhere else—and they turn on the cream with a tap, out of a thing that looks like a miniature cistern!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"You're not going back," he said. "You're going on the stage as a supernumerary instead!"

In the flare of the station lamps her eyes flashed at him; he could see the passionate trembling of her mouth. The cab stopped, and they got out, and threaded their way among the crowd to the barriers. There was a train in ten minutes, Heriot learnt.

"Shall we go to the waiting-room?"

"No," said Miss Cheriton.

"Forgive me what I said just now. I am sorry."

"What does it matter?"

"It was brutal."

"Rather, perhaps. It was unexpected. You have failed me when I wanted you most."

He took two first-class tickets—he wished to be alone with her, and he knew that she travelled "second."

"I'm coming with you," he said.

"But you can't have dined? Our suppers are not extensive."

"Let us get in!" he answered.

They had the compartment to themselves when the door banged, and he regarded her silently, with nerves that had escaped control.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I have warned you," she said. "It will be something out of a tin for certain, with vinegar over it."

"Mamie!"

There was rebuke in the expression.

"Mamie!" he repeated, "I love you. Why I dislike your going on the stage is because I want you myself. I was 'brutal,' because I'm fond of you. Will you marry me?"

She lay back against the darkness of the cushions, pale and startled.

"Are you serious?" she said. "You—want to marry me! Do you mean it?"

"I mean it. I don't seem able to tell you how much I mean it! Can you like me well enough to be my wife?"

"I do like you," she stammered; "but I hadn't an idea. . . . I never thought you thought— Oh, I'm sorry!"

"Why? Why can't you say 'yes'?"

"To marry you!"

"I'll be very gentle to you," he said shakily.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I—for God's sake, don't judge my love for you by the way I put it! I haven't had much practice in love-making, it's a pity, perhaps! There's a word that says it all—I 'worship' you. My darling, what have you to look forward to? You've seen, you've tried, you know what an uphill life it will be. It's not as if I begged you to waive your hopes while you had encouragement to hope—you've made the attempt, and you know the difficulties now! Come to me instead. You shall live where you like—you can choose your own quarter. You can have everything you care for—books, pictures, theatres, too. Oh, my sweet! come to me, and I'll fulfil every wish. Will you, Mamie?"

"I can't," she said tremulously, "it wouldn't be fair." Her eyes shone at him, and she leant forward with parted lips. "I like you, I like you very much, but I don't—I'm not—I've never been in love with any one!"

"I will be grateful for small mercies," said Heriot, with an unhappy laugh.

"And I could not do what you ask. If I fail, I fail; but I must persevere. I can't accept failure voluntarily—I can't stretch out my arms to it. I should despise myself if I gave in to-day. Even you——”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“You know better than that,” he said.

“Well, yes,” she owned, “perhaps I’m wrong there! To you it would seem a sensible step; but I believe in myself. All my life I’ve had the thought, and I should be miserable, I should hate myself. I should be like my father—I should be always thinking of the ‘might have been.’ You’d be good to me, but you’d know you’d been a fool. I’m not a bit the sort of woman you should marry, and you’d repent it.”

Heriot took her hand and held it tightly.

“I love you,” he said. “Consider your own happiness only. I love you!”

“I am quite selfish—I know it wouldn’t content me; I’m not pretending to any nobility. But I’m sorry; I may say that! I didn’t dream you liked me in this way. I’m not hard, I’m not a horror, and I can see—I can see that I’m a lot to you.”

“I’m glad of that,” he said simply. “Yes, you’re ‘a lot to me,’ Mamie. If you know it, and you can’t care for me enough, there’s no more for me to say. Don't worry yourself. It's not unusual for a man to be fond of a woman who doesn't want to marry him."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

CHAPTER V

SHE betook herself to the Queen's next morning less buoyantly than she had anticipated. Her meeting with Heriot had depressed her. She retained much of the nature of a child, and laughed or cried very easily. She had met Heriot laughing, and he had been serious and sad. With some petulance she felt that she was very unfortunate in that he had fallen in love with her, and chosen that particular day to tell her so.

She entered the stage-door with no presentiment of conquest, and inquired of the man in the little recess if Mr. Casey was in the theatre. Stage-door keepers are probably the surliest class in existence. They have much to try them, and they spend their lives in a violent draught ; but the only known creature more uncivil to the public at large than a stage-door keeper is a New York policeman.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He took her measure in an instant, saving in one particular—she was prepared to give him a shilling, and he did not suspect it !

“ Mr. Casey's on the stage,” he said ; “ he won't be disturbed now.”

“ If I waited, do you think I might see him ? ”

“ I couldn't tell you, I'm sure.”

He resumed his perusal of a newspaper, and Mamie looked at him through the aperture helplessly. There was the usual knot of loafers about the step—a scene-hand or two in their shirt-sleeves, a girl in her pathetic best dress, also hoping for miracles, a member of the company, who had slipped out from rehearsal to smoke a cigarette.

Cerberus was shown where his estimate had been at fault. He said “ Miss ” now : “ If you write your business on one of these forms, I'll send it in to Mr. Casey, Miss.”

He gave her a stump of pencil, and a printed slip specially designed to scare intruders. She wrote her name, and Mr. Casey's name, and could find no scope for euphemisms regarding the nature of the interview she sought. She added, "To obtain engagement as Extra," and returned the paper with embarrassment; she was sufficiently unsophisticated in such matters to assume that her object had not been divined.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"'Ere, Bill." One of the scene-hands turned. "Take it in to Mr. Casey for this lady."

The man addressed as Bill departed through a second door with a grunt and a bang, and she waited expectantly. The girl in her best frock sneered; she could not afford to dispense shillings herself, and already her feet ached. The door swung back constantly. At intervals of a few seconds a stream of nondescripts issued from the unknown interior, and Mamie stood watching for the features of her messenger. It was nearly a quarter of an hour before he reappeared, however.

"Mr. Casey can't see you," he announced.

The hall-keeper heard the intelligence with absolute indifference; but the girl on the step looked gratified.

"What shall I do?" asked Mamie.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I can't do no more than send in for you, Miss. It ain't much good your waiting—the 'call' won't be over till three o'clock."

"Could I see him then?"

"He'll come out. If you like to take your chance——"

"I'll come back at three o'clock," she said. It was then eleven.

She turned into the Strand—the Strand that has broken more hearts than Fleet Street. Here a young actor passed her, who was likewise pacing the inhospitable pavements until the hour arrived in which he hoped that patience and importunity might bear result. He wore a fashionable overcoat, and swung his cane with a gloved hand. Presently he would seek a public-house, and lunch on a scone and a glass of "mild-and-bitter." If he had "bitter," he would be a halfpenny short in his homeward fare to Bow. There a burlesque actress went by, who had "married a swell." His family had been deeply wounded, and they showed their mortification by allowing her to support him. She had had three children; and when he was drunk, which was frequently, he said, "God forbid that they should ever become damned mummers like their mother!" A manager had just told her that "she had lost her figure, and wouldn't look the part!" and she was walking back to Islington, where the brokers were in the house. A popular comedian, who had been compelled to listen to three separate tales of distress between Charing Cross and Bedford Street, and had already lent unfortunate acquaintances thirty shillings, paused, and hailed a hansom from motives of economy. It was the typical crowd of the Strand, a crowd of the footlights. The men whose positions had been won were little noticeable, but the gait and costume of the majority—affected Youth and disheartened Age—indicated their profession to the least experienced eyes. Because she grew very tired, and not that she had any expectation of hearing good news, Mamie went into Mr. Passmore's office, and sat down.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

And she did not hear any. After an hour she went away, and rested next in the anteroom of another of the agents, who repeated that "things were very quiet," and that "he wouldn't forget her." Seven or eight other girls were waiting their turn to be told the same thing. At a quarter to three she went back to the Queen's.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Is he coming out now?" she said. "Am I too soon?"

"Eh?" said the hall-keeper.

"You told me he'd be out about three. I was asking for Mr. Casey this morning."

"Oh, were you?" he said. "There's been a good many asking for him since then." He gradually recalled her. "Mr. Casey's gone," he added; "they finished early. He won't be here till to-night."

There was a week in which she went to the stage-door of the Queen's Theatre every day, at all hours, and at last she learnt casually that as many "extras" as were required for the production had been engaged. There were months during which she persisted in her applications at other stage-doors, and hope still flickered within her. But when September came, and a year had passed since her arrival, the expiring spark had faded into lassitude. She tried no longer. Only sometimes, out of the sickness of her soul, the impulse to write was born, and she picked up a pen.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Then it was definitely decided that she should return to America. It was characteristic of her that she had no sooner dried her eyes after the decision than she was restless to return at once. Duluth was no drearier than Wandsworth ; externally it was even picturesque, with the blue water and the sunshine, and the streets of white châteaux rising in tiers like a theatre. In Duluth the residents "looked down on one another" literally. The life was appalling, but when all was said, was it more limited than Aunt Lydia ! And if, in lieu of acting, she dared aspire to dramatic authorship—the thought stirred her occasionally—she could work as well in Minnesota as in London. Cheriton had remitted the amount of her passage, and suggested that she should sail in a week or two. She had not received the draft two hours when she went up to town, and booked a berth in the next steamer.

When it was done, she posted a note to Heriot, acquainting him with her intention. His visits had not been discontinued, but he came at much longer intervals latterly, and she could not go without bidding him good-bye.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

She sat in the Lavender Street parlour the next evening, wondering if he would come. Almost she hoped he would not. She had written, and therefore done her duty. To see him under the circumstances, she felt, would humiliate her cruelly. She remembered how she had talked to him twelve months before—recalled her confidence, her pictures of a future that she was never to know now, and her eyes smarted afresh. She had even failed to obtain a hearing! "What a fool, what an idiot I look!" she thought passionately.

Tea was over, but the maid-of-all-work had not removed the things; and when Heriot entered, the large loaf and the numerous knives, which are held indispensable to afternoon tea in Lavender Street, were still on the big round table. The aspect of the room did not strike him any more. He was familiar with it, like the view of the kitchen when the front door had been opened, and the glimpse of clothes-line in the yard beyond.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"May I come in?" he said. "Did you expect me?"

"Lor, it's Mr. Heriot!" said Mrs. Baines. "Fancy!"

She told the servant to take away the teapot, and to bring in another knife. He wondered vaguely what he was supposed to do with it.

"I thought it likely you'd be here," said Mamie; "won't you sit down?"

"I only had your letter this morning. So you are going away?"

"I am going away. I bow, more or less gracefully, to the inevitable."

"To bow gracefully to the inevitable is strong evidence of the histrionic gift," he said.

"I came, I saw, I was conquered; please don't talk about it. . . . It was only settled yesterday. I sail on Saturday, you know."

"Yes, you wrote me," murmured Heriot. "It is very sudden!"

"I am crazy to do something, if only to confess myself beaten."

"May I offer you a cup o' tea, Mr. Heriot?" asked Mrs. Baines.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

She always "offered" cups of tea, and was indebted to neighbours for their "hospitality."

He thanked her.

"You will miss your niece," he said, declining a place at the round table, to which she had moved a chair.

"Yes, I'm sure," she answered. "I say it's a pity now she didn't go with her father last October. . . . Going in a vessel by herself, oh, dear! I say I wouldn't have got accustomed to having her with me if she'd gone with her father; though that's neither here nor there."

"Yes, I think you may believe you will be missed, Miss Cheriton," he said.

"I say it's very odd she couldn't be an actress as she wanted," continued Mrs. Baines. "Seems so unfortunate with all the trouble that she took. But la! my dear, we can't see what lies ahead of us, and perhaps it's all for the best! I say perhaps it's all for the best, Mr. Heriot, eh? Dear Mamie may be meant to do something different—writing, or what not; it's not for us to say."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Have you been writing again?" asked Heriot, turning to the girl.

"A little," she said bitterly. "My vanity dies hard—and Aunt Lydia has encouraged me."

Heriot looked a reproach; her tone hurt him, though he understood of what it was the outcome.

"I should be glad if you had encouragement," he replied; "I think you need it now!"

But it hurt him, also, to discuss her pain in the presence of the intolerable third. He knew that if he remained to supper there would be a preparatory quarter of an hour in which he was alone with her; and it was for this quarter of an hour that he hungered, conscious that during the opening of the lobster-tin two destinies would be determined.

"That's right, Mr. Heriot," said Mrs. Baines placidly. "I'm glad to hear you say so. That's what I've been telling her. I say she mustn't be disheartened. Why, it's surprising; I'm sure, how much seems to be thought of people who write stories and things now-a-days; they seem to make quite a fuss of them, don't they? And I'm certain dear Mamie could write if she put her mind to it. I was reading in the paper, Tit-Bits, only last week, that there was a book called Robert Ellis, or some such name, that made the author quite talked about. Now, I read the piece out to you, dear, didn't I? A book about religion, it was, by a lady; and I'm sure dear Mamie knows as much about religion as any one."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"My aunt means Robert Elsmere," said Mamie, in a laboured voice. "You may have heard it mentioned?"

"You mustn't expect Mr. Heriot to know much about it," said Mrs. Baines; "Mr. Heriot is so busy a gentleman that very likely he doesn't hear of these things. But I assure you, Mr. Heriot, the story seems to have been read a great deal; and what I say is, if dear Mamie can't be an actress, why shouldn't she write books, if she wants to do something of the sort? I wonder my brother didn't teach her to paint, with her notions and that—but, not having learnt, I say she ought to write books. That's the thing for her—a nice pen and ink, and her own home!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I agree with you, Mrs. Baines. If she wants to write, she can do that in her own home."

"Not to compare it with such a profession as yours, Mr. Heriot," she said, "which, of course, is sensible and grave. But girls can't be barristers, and——"

"Will you open the window for me?" exclaimed Mamie; "it's frightfully warm, don't you think so?"

She stood there with her head thrown back, and closed eyes, her foot tapping the floor restlessly.

"Are you wishing you hadn't come?" she asked under her breath.

"Why?"

"One must suffer to be polite here."

"Aren't you a little unjust?" said Heriot deprecatingly.

"You have it for an hour," she muttered; "I have had it for twelve months. Have you ever wanted to shriek? I wanted to shriek just now, violently!"

"I know you did," he said. "Well, it's nearly over. . . . Are you glad?"

"Yes, and no—I can't say. If——"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Won't you go on?"

"If I dared hope to do anything else . . .
But I'm not going to talk like that any more;
I'm ridiculous enough already!"

"To whom are you ridiculous?"

"To my own perception; you!"

"Not to me," he said.

"'Pathetic'? yes, to you I'm 'pathetic.' You pity me as you might pity a lunatic who imagined she was the Queen of England."

"I think you know," said Heriot diffidently, "that neither Her Majesty nor a lunatic inspires quite the feeling in me that I have for yourself."

She changed her position, and spoke at random:

"This street is awfully stupid, isn't it?" she said. "Look at that man going up the steps!"

"Yes, he is very stupid, I daresay. What of it?"

"He is a clerk," she said; "and wheels his babies out on Sunday."

"Mamie!"

"Come and talk to Aunt Lydia again. How rude we are!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I want to talk to you," he demurred. "Aren't you going to ask me to stay to supper?"

The suggestion came from the widow almost at the same moment.

"I think we had better have the lamp," she went on. "The days are drawing in fast, Mr. Heriot, aren't they? We shall soon have winter again! Do you like the long evenings, or the long afternoons best? Just about now I always say that I can't bear to think of having to begin lighting up at five or six o'clock—it seems so unnatural; and then, next summer, somehow I feel quite lost, not being able to let down the blinds, and light the lamp for tea. Mamie, dear, shut the window, and let down the blinds before I light the lamp—somebody might see in!" She suggested this danger in the same tone in which she might have hinted at a burglary.

Under a glass shade a laggard clock ticked drearily towards the crisis, and Heriot provoked its history by the eagerness with which he looked to see the time. It had been a wedding-present from "poor dear Edward's brother"; and only one clockmaker had really understood it. The man had died, and since then——

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He listened, praying for the kitchen to engulf her.

When she withdrew at last, with an apology for leaving him, he rose, and went to the girl's side.

"Do you know why I came this afternoon?" he said.

She did know—had known it in the moment that he opened the window for her :

"To say 'good-bye,'" she murmured.

"I came to beg you not to go! Dearest, what do you relinquish by marrying me now? Not the Stage—your hope of the Stage is over; not your ambition in itself—you can be ambitious as my wife. You lose nothing, and you give—a heaven. Mamie, won't you stay?"

She leant upon the mantelpiece without speaking. In the pause, Mrs. Baines' voice reached them distinctly, as she said, "Put the brawn on a smaller dish."

"You are forgetting," answered the girl slowly; "there was . . . a reason besides the Stage."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"It is you who've forgotten. I told you I would be content. . . . It would not be repugnant to you?"

"To refuse while I thought I had a future; and to say 'yes,' now—— How can you ask me! It would be an insult to your love."

"I do ask you," he urged; "I implore!"

"You implore me to be contemptible. You would have a disappointed woman for your wife. You deserve something better than that."

"Oh, my God," said Heriot, in a low voice, "if I could only tell you how I ache to take you in my arms, as softly as if you were a child! If I could tell you what it is to me to know that you are passing out of my life, and that in two days' time I shall never see you again! . . . Mamie?"

The heavy shuffle of the domestic was heard in the passage.

"Mamie?" he repeated desperately. "It will be worse over there."

Her eyes were big with perplexity and doubt.

"Mamie?"

"Are you sure you—sure——"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I love you ; I want you. Only trust me!
. . . Mamie?"

"If you're quite sure you wish it," she faltered,—“yes!”

CHAPTER VI

WHEN Heriot informed his brother of his approaching marriage, Sir Francis said, "I never offer advice to a man on matters of this sort"; and proceeded to advise. He considered the union undesirable, and used the word.

Heriot replied, "On the contrary, I desire it extremely."

"You're of course the best judge of your own affairs. I will only say that it is hardly the attachment I should have expected you to form. It appears to me—if I may employ the term—romantic."

"I should say," said Heriot, in his most impassive manner, "that that is what it might be called. Admitting the element of romance, what of it?"

"We are not boys, George," said Sir Francis.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He added, "And the lady is twenty-two! The father is an hotel-keeper in the United States, you tell me, and the aunt lives in Wandsworth. Socially, Wandsworth is farther than the United States, but geographically it is close. This Mrs. Payne—or Baynes—is not a connection you will be proud of, I take it?"

"I shall be very proud of my wife," said Heriot, with some stiffness. "There are more pedigrees than happy marriages."

The baronet looked at his watch. "As I have said, it's not a matter that I would venture to advise you upon. Of course I congratulate you. We shall see Miss Cheriton at Fairlawn, I hope? And—er—Catherine will be delighted to make her acquaintance. I have to meet Phil at the 'Piccadilly.' He's got some absurd idea of exchanging—wants to go out to India, and see active service. And I got him into the Guards! Boys are damned ungrateful! . . . When do you marry?"

"Very shortly: during the vacation; there'll be no fuss."

Sir Francis told his wife that it was very "lamentable," and Lady Heriot preferred to describe it as "disgusting." But in spite of adjectives the ceremony took place.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The honeymoon was brief, and when the bride and bridegroom came back to town, they stayed in an hotel in Victoria Street while they sought a flat. Ultimately they decided upon one in South Kensington, and it was the man's delight to render this as exquisite as taste and money made possible. The furniture for his study had simply to be transferred from his bachelor quarters, but the other rooms gave scope for a hundred consultations and caprices, and he enjoyed the moments like a lad in which Mamie and he bent their heads together over patterns and designs.

She would have been more than human, and less than lovable, if in those early weeks her disappointment had not been lost sight of; more than a girl if the atmosphere of devotion in which she moved had not persuaded her primarily that she was content. Only after the installation was effected and the long days while her husband was away were no longer occupied by the upholsterers' plans, did the earliest returning stir of recollection come ; only as she wandered from the drawing-room to the dining-room, and could find no further touches to make, did she first sigh.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

A gift of Heriot's—he had chosen it without her knowledge, and it had been delivered as a surprise—was a writing-table ; a writing-table that was not merely meant to be a costly ornament, and one morning she sat down to it and began another attempt to produce a play. The occupation served to interest her, and now the days were not so empty. In the evening, as often as he was able, Heriot took her out to a theatre, or a concert, or to houses from which invitations commenced to arrive. The evenings were enchantingly new to her ; less so, perhaps, when they dined at the solemn houses than when a hansom deposited them at the doors of a restaurant, and her husband's pocket contained the tickets for a couple of stalls. She was conscious that she owed him more than she could ever repay ; and though she had casually informed him that she had begun a drama, she did not discuss the subject with him at any length. To dwell upon those eternal ambitions of hers was to remind him that she had said she would be dissatisfied, and he deserved something different from that ; he deserved to forget it, to be told that she had not an ungratified wish ! She felt ungrateful to realize that such a statement would be an exaggeration.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

In the November following the wedding it was seen that " Her Majesty had been pleased, on the recommendation of the Lord Chancellor, to approve the name of George Langdale Heriot to the rank of Queen's Counsel," and Heriot soon found reason to congratulate himself on his step. A man may earn a large income as a Junior, and find himself in receipt of a very poor one as a Leader. There is an instance cited in the Inns of Court of a stuff-gownsmen, making eight thousand a year, whose income fell, when he took silk, to three hundred. But Heriot's practice did not decline. Few men at the Bar could handle a jury better, or showed greater address in their dealings with the Bench. He knew instinctively the moment when that small concession was advisable, when the attitude of uncompromising rigour would be fatal to his case. He had his tricks in court : the least affected of men out of it, in court he had his tricks. Counsel acquire them inevitably, and one of Heriot's had been a favourite device of Ballantyne's: in cross-examination he looked at the witness scarcely at all, but kept his face turned to the jury-box. Why this should be persuasive is a mystery that no barrister can explain, but its effectiveness is undeniable. Nevertheless, he was essentially "sound." As he had been known as "a safe man" while a Junior, so, now that he had taken silk, he was believed in as a Leader. The figures on the briefs swelled enormously; his services were more and more in demand. Then by-and-by there came a criminal case that was discussed day by day throughout the length and breadth of the kingdom—in drawing-rooms and back parlours, in clubs and suburban trains, and Heriot was for the Defence. The Kensington study had held him until dawn during weeks, for he had to break down medical evidence. And on the last day he spoke for five hours, while the reporters' pens flew and the prisoner swayed in the dock; and the verdict returned was, "Not Guilty."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

ONE MAN'S VIEW

When he unrobed and left the court, George Heriot walked into the street the man of the hour ; and he drove home to Mamie, who kissed him as she might have kissed her father.

He adored his wife, and his wife felt affection for him. But the claims of his profession left her to her own resources ; and she had no child.

CHAPTER VII

WHEN they had been married three years she knew many hours of boredom. She could not disguise from herself that she found the life she led more and more unsatisfying—that luxury and a devoted husband, who was in court during the day and often in his study half the night, were not all that she had craved for ; that her environment was Philistine, depressing, dull !

And she lectured herself, and said the fault was her own, and that it was a very much better environment than her abilities entitled her to. She recited all the moral precepts that a third person might have uttered ; and the dissatisfaction remained.

To write plays ceases to be an attractive occupation when they are never produced. She had written several plays by this time, and submitted them, more or less judiciously, to several West End theatres. There had even been an instance of a manager returning a manuscript in response to her fourth application for it. But she was no nearer to success, or to an artistic circle.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

A career at the Bar is not all causes célèbres, and the details of Heriot's briefs were rarely enthralling to her mind, even when he discussed them with her; and when he came into the drawing-room he did not want to discuss his briefs. He wanted to talk trifles, just as he preferred to see a musical comedy or a farce when they went out. Nor did he press her for particulars of her own pursuits during his absence. She never sighed over him, and he read her display of cheerfulness as true contentment. That such allusions to her literary work as she made were careless, he took to mean that she had gradually acquired staidier views. Once he perceived that it was perhaps quieter for her than for most women, for she had no intimate acquaintances; but then she had never been used to any! There were her books, and her music, and her shopping—no, he did not think she could be hipped. Besides, her manner at dinner was always direct evidence to the contrary!

ONE MAN'S VIEW

She was now twenty-five years old, and the Kensington flat and abundant means had lost their novelty. She was never moved by a clever novel without detesting her own obscurity; never looked in the window of the Stereoscopic Company without a passion of envy for the successful artists; never accompanied Heriot to the solemn houses without yearning for the entrée to Upper Bohemia instead. She was twenty-five years old, and marriage, without having fulfilled the demands of her temperament, had developed her sensibilities. It was at this period that she met Lucas Field.

If her existence had been a story, nothing could have surprised her less than such a meeting. It would have been at this juncture precisely that she looked for the arrival of an artist, and "Lucas Field" would probably have been a brilliant young man who wore his hair long, and published decadent verse. The trite in fiction is often very astonishing in one's own life, however, and, as a matter of fact, she found their introduction an event, and fore-saw nothing at all.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Lucas Field was naturally well known to her by reputation—so well known that when the hostess brought “Mr. Field” across to her, Mamie never dreamed of identifying him with the dramatist. She had long since ceased to expect to meet anybody congenial at these parties, and the fish had been reached before she discovered who it really was who had taken her down.

Field was a trifle bored himself. He had not been bred in the vicinity of the foot-lights—his father had been a physician, and his mother the daughter of a Lincolnshire parson—but he had drifted into dramatic literature when he came down from Oxford, and the atmosphere of the artistic world had become essential to him by now. Portman Square, though he admitted its desirability and would have been mortified if it had been denied to him, invariably oppressed him a shade when he entered it. He was at the present time foretasting hell in the fruitless endeavour to devise a scenario for his next play, and he had looked at Mamie with a little interest as he was conducted across the drawing-room. A beautiful woman has always an air of suggestion; she is a beginning, but she does not advance. She is a heroine without a plot. Regarded from the easel she is all-sufficing—contemplated from the desk, she is illusive. After you have admired the tendrils of hair, at the nape of her neck, you realize with despondence that she takes you no farther than if she had been plain.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Field had realized that she left him in the lurch before his soup plate had been removed. Presently he inquired if she was fond of the theatre.

"Please don't say 'yes' from politeness," he added.

"Why should I?"

She had gathered the reason in the next moment, and her eyes lit with eagerness. He had a momentary terror that she was going to be commonplace.

"I couldn't dream that it was you—here!" she said apologetically.

"Isn't a poor playwright respectable?" he asked.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

There was an instant in which she felt that on her answer depended the justification of her soul. She said afterwards that she could have "fallen round an epigram's neck."

"I should think the poor playwright must be very dull!" she replied.

This was adequate, however, and better than his own response, which was of necessity conventional.

"I have seen your new comedy," she continued.

"I hope it pleased you?"

"I admired it immensely—like every one else. It is a great success, isn't it?"

"The theatre is very full every night," he said deprecatingly.

"Then it is a success!"

"Does that follow?"

"You are not satisfied with it? It falls short of what you meant? I shouldn't have supposed that; it seemed to me entirely clear!"

"That I had a theory? Really! Perhaps I have not failed so badly as I thought." He did not think he had failed at all, but this sort of thing was his innocent weakness.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Miss Millington is almost perfect as 'Daisy,' isn't she?"

"'Almost'? Where do you find her weak?"

She blushed;

"She struck me—of course I am no authority—as not quite fulfilling your idea in the first Act—when she accepted the captain. I thought perhaps she was too responsible there—too grown up."

"There isn't a woman in London who could play 'Daisy,'" said Field savagely. "In other words, you think she wrecked the piece?"

"Oh, no, indeed!"

"If 'Daisy' isn't a child when she marries, the play has no meaning, no sense. That is why the character was so difficult to cast—in the first Act she must be a school-girl, and in the others an emotional woman."

"Perhaps I said too much."

"You are a critic, Mrs. Heriot."

"Oh, merely——"

"Merely?"

"Merely very interested by the Stage."

"To be interested by the Stage is very ordinary," he said; "to be a judge of it is rather rare. No, you didn't say too much: Miss Millington doesn't fulfil my idea when she accepts 'Captain Arminger.' And to be frank, I haven't fulfilled Miss Millington's idea of a consistent part."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I can understand," said Mamie, "that it is the great drawback to writing for the stage, that one depends so largely on one's interpreters. A novelist succeeds or fails by himself, but a dramatist——"

"A dramatist is the most miserable of created beings," said Field, "if he happens to be an artist."

"I can hardly credit that! I can't credit anybody being miserable who is an artist." (He laughed. It was not polite, but he couldn't help it.) "Though I can understand his having moods of the most frightful depression," she added.

"Oh, you can understand that?"

"Quite. Would he be an artist if he didn't have them!"

"May I ask if you write yourself?"

"N—no," she murmured.

"Does that mean 'yes'?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"It means 'only for my own amusement'!"

"The writer who only writes for his own amusement is mythical, I'm afraid," said Field. "One often hears of him, but he doesn't bear investigation. You don't write plays?"

"No—I try to!"

He regarded her a little cynically.

"I thought ladies always wrote novels?"

"I wish to be original, you see."

"Do you send them anywhere?"

"Oh, yes; I send them; I suppose I always shall."

"You're really in earnest then? You're not discouraged?"

"I'm very earnest, and very discouraged, too. . . . Is it impertinent to ask if you had such experiences as mine when you were younger?"

"I wrote plays for ten years before I passed through a stage-door—one must expect to work for years before one is produced. . . . Of course, one may work all one's life, and not be produced then!"

"It depends how clever one is, or whether one is clever at all?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"It depends on a good many things. It depends sometimes on advice."

If she had been less lovely, he would not have said this, and he knew it; if she had not been Mrs. Heriot, he would not have said it either. The average woman who "wants a literary man's advice" is the bane of his existence, and Field had not only no sympathy with the tyro as a rule, but was inclined to disparage the majority of his colleagues. He was clever, and was aware of it; he occupied a prominent position. He had arrived at the point when he could dare to be psychological "It depends sometimes on advice," he said. And the wife of George Heriot, Q.C., murmured: "Unfortunately, I have nobody to advise me!"

Even as it was he regretted it when he took his leave; and the manuscript that he had offered to read lay in his study for three weeks before he opened it. He picked it up one night, remembering that the writer had been very beautiful. The perusal inspired him with the desire to see her again. That the play was full of faults goes without saying, but it was unconventional, and there was character in it. He recollected that she had interested him while they talked after dinner on a couch by the piano; and, since her work was promising, he wrote, volunteering to point out in an interview, if she liked, those errors in technique which it would take too long to explain by letter. It cannot be made too clear that if she had sent him a work of genius and she had been plain Miss Smith in a home-made blouse, he would have done nothing of the sort. He called upon her with no idea that his hints would make a dramatist of her eventually; nor did he care in the slightest degree whether they did, or did not. She was a singularly lovely woman, and as her drama had not been stupid—stupidity would have repelled him—he thought a tête-à-tête with her would be agreeable.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

To Mamie he was as all the Muses in one, however, and the afternoon on which he sat like an ordinary mortal sipping tea in her flat was the day of her life. She told him she had once hoped to be an actress, and believed that the avowal would advance her in his esteem. He answered that he should not be astonished if she had the histrionic gift ; and was inwardly disenchanted a shade by what he felt to be banal. Then they discussed his own work, and he found her appreciation remarkably intelligent. To talk about oneself to a woman, who listens with exquisite eyes fixed upon one's face, is very gratifying to a literary man. If one is mediocre, she makes one feel clever ; and if one have talent, one feels greater still. Field had rarely spent a pleasanter hour. It is not intimated that he was a vain puppy—he was not a puppy at all. He had half unconsciously felt the want of a sympathetic confidant for a long while, though, and albeit he did not instantaneously realize that Mrs. Heriot supplied the void, he walked back to his chambers with exhilaration.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He realized it by degrees. He had never married. He had avoided matrimony till he was thirty because he could not afford it ; and during the last decade he had escaped it because he had not met a woman whom he desired sufficiently to pay such a price. When he had seen Mamie several times—and under the circumstances it was not difficult to invent reasons for seeing her—he wondered whether he would not have proposed to her if she had been single.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Heriot was very pleased to have him dine with them; and he was not ignorant that during the next few months Field often dropped in about five o'clock. Mamie concealed nothing—knowingly—and the subject of her writing was revived now. She told George that Mr. Field thought she had ability. She repeated his criticisms; frankly admired his talent; confessed that she was proud to have him on her visiting list; and fell in love with him without either analysing her feelings or perceiving her risk.

And while Mrs. Heriot fell in love with him, Lucas Field was not blind. He saw a great deal more than she saw herself—he saw, not only the influence he exercised over her, but that she had moped before he appeared. He did not misread her; he was conscious that she would never take a lover from caprice—that she was the last woman in the world to sin lightly and in secret. He saw that, if he yielded to the temptation that had begun to assail him, he must be prepared to ask her to live with him openly. But he asked himself if it was quite impossible he could prevail on her to do that, if he had the mind to do so—whether she was so impregnable as she believed.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He was by this time fascinated by her. His happiest afternoons were spent in South Kensington, advancing his theories, and reciting his latest scenes ; nor was it a lie when he averred that she assisted him. To be an artist it is not necessary to be able to produce, and if her own attempts had been infinitely more futile than they were, she might still have expressed opinions that were of service to another. Many of her views were impracticable, naturally. Psychological as his tendencies were, he was a dramatist ; and he could not snap his fingers at the laws imposed by the footlights, though he might affect to deride them in his confidences. The only dramatist alive was Ibsen, he said ; yet he did not model himself on Ibsen, albeit he was delighted when she exclaimed, "How Ibsenish that is!" Many of her views were impracticable, because she was ignorant about the Stage ; but many were intensely stimulating.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The more he was with her, the less he doubted her worthiness of sinning for his sake. He was so different from the ordinary dramatic author. On the ordinary dramatic author with no ideas beyond "curtains" and "fees," she would have been thrown away. He did not wish to be associated with a scandal—it would certainly be unpleasant—but she dominated him, there was no disguising the fact. And he would be very good to her; he would marry her. She was adorable.

His meditations had not progressed so far without the girl's eyes being opened to her weakness; and now she hated herself more bitterly than she had hated the tedium of her life. She knew that she loved him. She was wretched when he was not with her, and ashamed when he was there. She wandered about the flat in her solitude, frightened as she realized what an awful thing had come to her. But she was drunk—intoxicated by the force of the guilty love, and by the thought that such a man as Lucas Field could be in love with her. She revered him for not having told her of the feelings she inspired; her courage was sustained by the belief that he did not divine her own—that she would succeed in stamping them out without his ever having dreamed of the danger she had run. Yet she was “drunk”; and one afternoon the climax was reached—he implored her to go away with him!

ONE MAN'S VIEW

CHAPTER VIII

IF a woman sins, and the chronicler of her sin desires to excuse the woman, her throes and her struggles, her pangs and her prayers always occupy at least three chapters. If one does not seek to excuse her, the fact of her fall may as well be stated in the fewest possible words. Mamie did struggle—she struggled for a long time—but in the end she was just as guilty as if she hadn't shed a tear. Field's pertinacity and passion wore her resistance out at last. Theirs was to be the ideal union, and of course he cited famous cases where the man and woman designed for each other by Heaven had only met after one of them had blundered. He did not explain why Heaven had permitted the blunders, after being at the pains to design kindred souls for one another's ecstasy; but there are things that even the youngest curate cannot explain. He insisted that she would never regret her step; he declared that, with himself for her husband, she would become celebrated. Art, love, joy, all might be hers at a word. And she spoke it.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

When Heriot came in one evening, Mamie was not visible, and he wondered what had become of her, for at this hour she was always at home. But he had not a suspicion of evil—he was as far from being prepared for the blow that was in store as if Field had never crossed their path. He had let himself in with his latch-key, and after a quarter of an hour it occurred to him that she might be already in the dining-room. When he entered it he noted with surprise that the table was only laid for one.

“Where is Mrs. Heriot?” he said, when the servant appeared in response to his ring.

“Mrs. Heriot has gone out of town, sir.”

“Out of town!” he exclaimed. “What do you mean?”

“Mrs. Heriot left a note for you, sir, to explain. There it is, sir.”

Heriot took it from the mantelpiece quickly; but still he had no suspicion—not an inkling of the truth. He tore the envelope open and read the enclosure, while the maid waited respectfully by the door.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Your mistress has been called away," he said when he had finished; "illness! She will be gone some time."

His back was to her; he could command his voice, but his face was beyond his control. He felt that if he moved he would reel, perhaps fall. He stood motionless, with the letter open in his hand.

"Shall I serve dinner, sir?"

"Yes, serve dinner, Odell; I'm quite ready."

It was his opportunity to gain the chair when the door closed, and he walked towards it slowly like a blind man. The letter that he held had left but one hope possible—the last hope of despair—to keep the matter for awhile from the servants' knowledge. As yet he was not suffering acutely; indeed, in these early moments, the effect of the shock was more physical than mental. There was a trembling through his body, and his head felt queerly light—empty, not his own.

The maid came back, and he forced himself to dine. The first spoonfuls of the soup he took were but heat—entirely tasteless—to his mouth, and at the pit of his stomach a sensation of sickness rose and writhed like something living. When she retired once more, his head fell forward on his arms ; it was a relief to rest it so in the seconds in which her vigilance was removed. He did not know how he could support the strain of the long ordeal !

ONE MAN'S VIEW

By degrees his stupor began to pass as he stared at the vacant place where his wife should have sat ; the dazed brain rallied to comprehension. His wife was not there because she was with her lover ! Oh, God ! with her “lover” —Mamie had given herself to another man ! Mamie ! Mamie had gone to another man ! His face was grey and distorted now, and the glass that he was lifting snapped at the stem. She had gone. She was no longer his wife ! She was guilty, shameless, defiled—Mamie !

He rose, an older, a less vigorous, figure.

“I shall be busy to-night,” he muttered ; “don't let me be disturbed.”

He went to his study, and dropped upon the seat before his desk. Her photograph confronted him, and he took it down, and held it shakenly. How young she looked! was there ever a face more pure! And Heaven knew that he had loved her as dearly only an hour ago as on the day that they were married! Not a whim of hers had been refused; not a request could he recollect that he had failed to obey. Yet now she was with a lover! She smiled in the likeness; the eyes that met his own were clear and tender; truth was stamped upon her features. He recalled incidents of the past three years, incidents that had been rich in the intimacy of their life. Surely in those hours she had loved him? That had not been gratitude—a sense of duty merely?—had she not loved him then? He remembered their wedding-day. How pale she had been, how innocent—a child. Yet now she was with a lover! A sob convulsed him, and he nodded slowly at the likeness through his tears. Presently he put it back; he was angered at his weakness. He had deserved something better at her hands! Pride forbade that he should mourn for her! He had married wildly, yes, he should have listened to advice; Francis had warned him. Perhaps while he wept they were laughing at him together, she and Field! How did he know it was Field—had she mentioned his name in the letter? He knew that it was Field instinctively; he marvelled that he had not foreseen the danger, and averted it. How stupid had the petitioners in divorce suits often appeared to him in his time!—he had wondered that men could be so purblind—and he himself had been as dense as any! . . . But she would not laugh! Ah, guilty as she was, she would not laugh—she was not so vile as that! The clock in the room struck one. He heard it half unconsciously—then started, and threw out his arms with a hoarse cry. He sprang to his feet, fired with the tortures of the damned. The sweat burst out on him, and the veins in his forehead swelled like cords. He was a temperate man, at once by taste and by necessity, but now he walked to where the brandy was kept, and drank a wine-glassful in gulps. “Mamie!” he groaned again; “Mamie!” The brandy did not blot the picture from his brain; and he refilled the glass. . . . Nothing would efface the picture!

ONE MAN'S VIEW

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He knew that it was hopeless to attempt to sleep, yet he went to the bedroom. The ivory brushes were gone from the toilet-table—she had been able to think of brushes! In the wardrobe the frocks were fewer, and the linen was less; the jewellery that he had given to her had been left behind. All was orderly. There were no traces of a hurried departure; the room had its usual aspect. He looked at the pillows. Against the one that had been hers lay the bag of silk and lace that contained her night-dress. Had she forgotten it; or was it that she had been incapable of transferring that? He picked it up, and dropped it out of sight in one of the drawers.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He did not go to bed; he spent the night in an armchair, re-reading the letter, and thinking. When the servant knocked at the door, he went to his dressing-room, and shaved. He had a bath, and breakfasted, and strolled to the station. Outwardly he had recovered from the blow, and his clerk who gave him his list of appointments remarked nothing abnormal about him. In court Heriot remembered that Mamie and he were to have dined in Holland Park in the evening, and during the luncheon adjournment he sent a telegram of excuse. If any one had known what had happened to him, he would have been thought devoid of feeling.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He had scarcely re-entered the flat when Mrs. Baines called. His first impulse was to decline to see her ; but he told the maid to show her in.

A glance assured him that she was ignorant of what had occurred.

"Dear Mamie is away, the servant tells me!" she said, simpering. "I hadn't seen her for such a long time that I thought I'd look in to-day. Not that I should have been so late, but I missed my train. I meant to come in and have a cup of tea with her at five o'clock. Well, I am unfortunate! And how have you been keeping, Mr. Heriot?"

"I'm glad to see you. I hope you are well Mrs. Baines."

"Where has dear Mamie gone?" she asked. "Pleasuring?"

"She is on the Continent, I believe. May I tell them to bring you some tea now?"

"On the Continent alone?" exclaimed Mrs. Baines. "Fancy!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"No, she is not alone," said Heriot. "You must prepare yourself for a shock, Mrs. Baines. Your niece has left me."

She looked at him puzzled. His tone was so composed that it seemed to destroy the significance of his words.

"Left you? How do you mean?"

"She has gone with her lover."

"Oh, my Gawd!" said Mrs. Baines. "Whatever are you saying, Mr. Heriot? Don't!"

"Your niece is living with another man. She left me yesterday," he continued quietly. "I regret to have to tell you such news."

He was sorrier as he observed the effect of the intelligence, but he could not soften the shock for her by any outward participation in her grief. Since he must speak at all, he must speak as he did.

"Oh, to hear of such a thing!" she gasped. "Oh, to think that—well—— Oh, Mr. Heriot, I can't—it can't be true. Isn't it some mistake? Dear Mamie would never be so wicked, I'm sure she wouldn't! It's some awful mistake, you may depend."

"There's no mistake, Mrs. Baines. My authority is your niece herself. She left a letter to tell me she was going, and why."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The widow moaned feebly.

"With another man?"

He bowed.

"Oh, Heaven will punish her, Mr. Heriot! Oh, what will her father say—how could she do it! And you—how gentle and kind to her you were I could see!"

"I did my best to make her happy," he said; "evidently I didn't succeed. Is it necessary for us to talk about it much? Believe me, you have my sympathy, but talking won't improve matters."

"Oh, but I can't look at it so—so calmly, Mr. Heriot! The disgrace! and so sudden! And it isn't for me to have your sympathy, I'm sure. I say it isn't for you to sympathise with me. My heart bleeds for you, Mr. Heriot!"

"You're very good," he answered; "but I don't know that a faithless wife is much to grieve for after all."

"Ah, but you don't mean that! You were too fond of her to mean it! She'll live to repent it, you may be certain—the Lord will bring it home to her! Oh, how could she do it! You don't—you don't intend to have a divorce?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Naturally I intend it. What else do you propose?"

"Oh, I don't know," she quavered, rocking herself to and fro, and smearing the tears down her cheeks with a forefinger in a black silk glove; "but the disgrace! And all Lavender Street to read about it! Ah, you won't divorce her, Mr. Heriot? It would be so dreadful!"

"Don't you want to see the man marry her?"

"How marry her?" she asked vaguely. "Oh, I understand! Yes, I suppose he could marry her then, couldn't he? I'm not a lawyer like you; I didn't look so far ahead. But I don't want a divorce."

"Ah, well, I want it," he said; "for my own sake."

"Then you don't love her any more, Mr. Heriot?"

He laughed drearily.

"Your niece has ended her life with me of her own accord. I've nothing more to do with her."

"Those are cruel words," said Mrs. Baines;

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"those are cruel words about a girl who was your lawful wife—the flesh of your bone in the sight of Gawd and man. You're harder than I thought, Mr. Heriot; you don't take it quite as I'd have supposed you'd take it. . . . So quiet and stern like! I think if you'd loved her tenderly, you'd have talked more heart-broken, though it's not for me to judge."

Heriot rose.

"I can't discuss my sentiments with you, Mrs. Baines. Think, if you like, that I didn't care for her at all. At least my duty to her is over; and I have a duty to myself to-day."

"To cast her off?" The semi-educated classes use the phrases of novelettes habitually. Whether this is the reason the novelettes trade in the phrases, or whether the semi-educated acquire the phrases from the novelettes, is not clear.

"To ——" He paused. He could not trust himself to speak at that moment.

"To cast her off!" repeated Mrs. Baines. "Oh, I don't make excuses for her; I don't pity her. Though she is my brother's child, I say she is deserving of whatever befalls her! I remember well that when Dick married I warned him against it; I said, 'She isn't the wife for you!' It's the mother's blood coming out in her, though still my brother's child. What was I going to say? I'm that upset that—— Oh, yes! I make no excuses for her, but I would have liked to see more sorrow, Mr. Heriot, on your part. I could have pitied you more if you'd have taken it more to heart. You may think me bold, but it was ever my way to say what was in my mind. I don't think I'll stop any longer. The way you may take it is between you and your Gawd, but——"—she put out her hand—"I don't think I'll stop."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Good-evening," he said stonily. "I'm sorry you cannot stay and dine."

She recollected on the stairs that she had not inquired who the man was; but she was too disgusted by Heriot's manner to go back.

CHAPTER IX

WHEN a naturally pure woman, who is not sustained by any emancipated views, consents to live with a man in defiance of social prejudices, she probably obtains as clear an insight as the world affords into the enormous difference that exists between the ideal and the actual. Matrimony does not illumine the difference so vividly, because matrimony, with all its disillusion, leaves her an unembarrassed conscience. With her lover such a woman experiences all the prose of wedlock, and a sting to boot. A man cannot be at concert-pitch all day long with his mistress any more easily than he can with his wife. She has to submit to bills and other practical matters just as much with a smirched reputation as she had with a spotless one. The romance does not wear any better because the Marriage Service is omitted. A lover is no less liable to be common-place than a husband when the laundress knocks the buttons off his shirts.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Yes, Mamie was infatuated by Field; she had not sinned with a cool head simply to procure a guide up Parnassus. But she had hoped to pick a few laurels there all the same. She found herself in a little flat in the Rue Tronchet. They had few visitors, and those who did come were men who talked in a language that she did not understand, but who looked things that she would have been glad had she misunderstood.

Nor was the remorse and humiliation that she felt leavened by any consciousness of advancing in her art. Field rather pooh-poohed her art as the months went by after the decree nisi was pronounced. He still discussed his work with her—perhaps less as if she had been a sybil than formerly, but still with interest in her ideas. Her own work, however, bored him now. He had no intention of being cold, but the subject seemed puerile to his mind. If she did write a play that was produced one day, or if she didn't, what earthly consequence was it? She would never write a great one; and these panting aspirations which begot such mediocre results savoured to him of a storm in a teacup—of a furnace lit to boil the kettle.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He was rather sorry that he had run away with her, but he did not regret it particularly. Of course he would marry her as soon as he could—he owed her that; and, since he was not such a blackguard as to contemplate deserting her by-and-by, he might just as well marry her as not. The whole affair had been a folly certainly. He was not rich, and he was extravagant; he would have done better to remain as he was. Still many men envied him. He trusted fervently she would not have children, though! It didn't seem likely; but if she ever did, the error would be doubled. He did not want a son who had cause to be ashamed of his mother when he grew up!

It was curious that she did not refer more often to his legalizing their union. Her position pained her he could see, and made her very frequently a dull companion. That was the worst of these things! One paid for the step dearly enough to expect lively society in return, and yet, if one complained of mournfulness, one would be a brute. He would write a drama some time or other to show that it was really the man who was deserving of sympathy in such an alliance. It would be very original, as he would treat it. The lover should explain his situation to another woman whom he had learnt to love since, and—well, he didn't see how it should end :—with the dilemma repeated? And it didn't matter after all, for nobody would have the courage to produce it.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He made these reflections in his study. In the salon—furnished in accordance with the tastes of the lady who had sub-let the flat to them for six months—Mamie stood staring down at the street. It was four o'clock, and, saving for half an hour at lunch, she had not seen him since ten. For distraction she could make her choice among some Tauchnitz novels, her music, and a walk. Excepting that the room was tawdry and ill-ventilated, and that she had lost her reputation, it was not unlike her life in South Kensington.

In her pocket was a letter from her father—the most difficult letter that it had ever fallen to Dick Cheriton's lot to compose. Theoreticcally he thought social prejudices absurd—as became an artist to whom God had given his soul—and had often insisted on their ineptitude. As regarded his own daughter, however, he would have preferred to see them treated with respect. There was a likeness to Lucas Field here. Field also dwelt on the hill-top, but he wanted his son, if he ever had one, to boast a stainless mother. Cheriton had not indited curses, like the fathers in melodrama, and the people who have “found religion”;—only the parents of melodrama, and the “Christians” who go to church twice every Sunday, are infamous enough to curse their children;—he had told her, if she found herself forsaken, to cable him for her passage-money back to Duluth. But that he was ashamed and broken by what she had done, he had not attempted to conceal; and as she stood there, gazing down on the Rue Tronchet, Mamie was recalling the confession she had sent, to which this was an answer. Phrases she had used came back to her:—“I have done my best, but my love was too strong for me”; “Wicked as it may be to say it, I know that, even in my guilt, I shall always be happy"; "I met the right man too late, but I am so young—I could not suffer all my life without him"; "Forgive me if you can." Had she—it was a horrible thought—had she been mistaken? Had she blundered more terribly than when she married? For, unless her prophecies of joy to the brim were fulfilled—unless her measure of thanksgiving overflowed—the blunder was more terrible, infinitely more terrible: she had been a gambler who staked her soul in her conviction of success.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The question was one that she had asked herself many times before, without daring to hear the answer; but that the answer was in her heart, though she shrank from acknowledging it, might be seen in her expression, in her every pose; it might be seen now, as she drooped by the window. She sighed, and sat down, and shivered. Yes, she knew it—she had thrown away the substance for the shadow; she could deceive herself no longer. Lucas Field was not so poetical a personality as she had imagined; guilt had no glamour; her devotion had been a flash in the pan—a madness that had burned itself out. She had no right to blame her lover for that ; only the prospect of marriage with him filled her with no elation ; it inspired misgiving rather. If she had made a blunder, would it improve matters to perpetuate it ? He was considerate to her, he spared her all the ignominy that was possible ; but instinctively she was aware that, if they parted, he would never miss her as her husband had done. In his life she would never make a hole ! She guessed the depth of Heriot's love better now that she had obtained a smaller one as plummet. Between the manner of the man who was not particularly sorry to have run away with her, and his whose pride she had been, the difference was tremendous to a woman whose position was calculated to develop her natural sensitiveness to the point of a disease.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Should she marry Lucas or not ? Hitherto she had merely avoided the query ; now she trembled before it. Expedience said, "Yes" ; something within her said, "No." The decree would be made absolute in two months' time. What was to become of her if they separated ? To Duluth she could never go, to be pointed at and despised ! She sighed again.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Bored, dear?" asked Field, in the doorway.

"I was thinking."

"That was obvious. Not of your—er—work?"

"No, not of my—'er—work.'"

He pulled his moustache with some embarrassment.

"I didn't mean anything derogatory to it."

"Oh, I know," she said wearily; "don't—it doesn't matter! You can't think much less of it than I am beginning to do myself. You can't take much less interest in it!"

"You are unjust," said Field.

"I am moped. Take me out. Take me out of myself if you can, but take me out of doors at any rate. I am yearning to be in a crowd."

"We might go to a theatre to-night," he said; "would you like to?"

"It doesn't amuse me very much; I don't understand what they say. Still it would be something. But I want to go out now for a walk. I don't like walking here alone; can't you come with me?"

"I'm afraid I can't. You forget I promised an 'interview' to that paper this afternoon. I expect the fellow here any moment."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"You promised it?" she exclaimed, with surprise. "Why, I thought you said that the paper was a 'rag,' and you wouldn't dream of consenting?"

"After all, one must be courteous. I changed my mind. There's some talk of translating A Clever Man's Son into French. An 'interview' just now would be good policy."

"You are going to be 'adapted'?" A Clever Man's Son?"

"Translated," he said. "I may adapt. I am—translated!"

She smiled, but perceived almost at the same instant that she had not been intended to do so, and that he had said it seriously.

"I make a very good 'interview,'" he continued, lighting a cigarette; "I daresay you've noticed it. I never count an epigram or two wasted, though they do go into another chap's 'copy.' That's where many men make a mistake; or very likely they can't invent the epigrams. Anyhow, they don't! The average 'interview' is as dull as the average play.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

People think it's the journalists' fault, but it isn't. It's the fault of the deady dull dogs who've got nothing to tell them. I ought to have gone a good deal farther than I have: I've the two essential qualities for success—I'm an artist and a showman."

"Don't!" she murmured; "don't!"

He laughed gaily.

"I'm perfectly frank; I admit the necessities of life—I've told you so before! My mind never works so rapidly as it does in prospect of a good advertisement. There the fellow is, I expect!" he added, as the bell rang. "The study is quite in disorder for him, and there are a bunch of Parma violets and a flask of maraschino on the desk. I'm going to remark that maraschino and the scent of violets are indispensable to me when I work. He won't believe it, unless he is very young, but he'll be immeasurably obliged; that sort of thing looks well in an 'interview'! Violets and maraschino are a graceful combination, I think."

She did not reply; she sat pale and chagrined. He was renowned enough, and more than talented enough to dispense with these stage-tricks in the library. She knew it, and he knew it, but he could not help them. Awhile ago they had caused her the cruellest pain ; now she was more contemptuous than anything else, albeit she was still galled that he should display his foibles so candidly. "I am quite frank," he had said. She found such "frankness" a milestone on the road she had travelled.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"My dear child," said Field, "among the illusions of a man's youth is the belief that, if he goes through life doing his humble best in an unobtrusive way, the press will say what a jolly fine fellow he is, and hold him up as a pattern to all the braggarts and poseurs who are blowing their own trumpets, and scraping on their own fiddles. Among the things he learns as he grows older is the fact that, if he does his best in an unobtrusive way, the press will say nothing about him at all! The fiddle and the trumpet are essential, but it is possible to play them with a certain amount of refinement. It is even possible—though a clever man cannot dispense with the fiddle and the trumpet—for the fiddle and the trumpet to be played so dexterously that he may dispense with cleverness! I do not go to such lengths myself——”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“You have no need to do so,” she said coldly.

“I have no need to do so—thank you! But I can quite conceive that, say, violets and maraschino, worked for all they were worth, might make a man famous alone. A mouse liberated a lion, and things smaller than a mouse have created one before now. The violet in the hedgerow ‘bloomed unseen,’—or ‘died unknown,’ was it? It did something modest and unsuccessful, I know! The violet assiduously paragraphed and paraded might lead to fortune.”

“I would rather be obscure, and do honest, conscientious work,” answered Mamie, “than write rubbish, and finesse myself into popularity.”

“It is much easier!” he said tranquilly. “To be obscure is the one thing that is easy still. You don’t mind my saying that I hate the adjectives you used, though, do you? The words, ‘honest’ and ‘conscientious,’ applied to literature, dearest, make me shudder. I am always afraid that 'wholesome' is coming in the next sentence."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Are you going to say so to your interviewer?"

"The remark doesn't scintillate with brilliance. It was sincere, and to be sincere and brilliant at the same time is a little difficult. . . . I've been both, though, in the Act I've just done; you must read it, or rather I'll read it to you. You'll be pleased with it. As soon as the piece is finished I must write to Erskine. It will suit the Pall Mall down to the ground, and I should like it done there, only——"

"Only what?"

Field hesitated.

"I meant it for Erskine from the commencement. He saw the scenario, and the part fits him like a glove."

"But what were you going to say?"

"Well, I fancy he has some idea that a piece of mine just now—you understand, with the case so fresh in people's minds . . . Erskine's a fool! What on earth does the public care? Of course he'll do it when he reads the part he's got! Only I know he is doubting whether my name would be a judicious card to play yet awhile."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

There was a pause, in which her heart contracted painfully.

"I see," she rejoined, in a low voice.

He fidgetted before the mirror, and glanced at his watch.

"That fellow must be getting impatient!"

"You had better go in to him," she said.

"Well, we'll go to the Vaudeville, or somewhere to-night, Mamie—that's arranged?"

"Yes, to the Vaudeville, or somewhere," she assented, with another sigh.

She went back to the window, and stared at the Rue Tronchet with wet eyes.

CHAPTER X

SOME weeks afterwards Field went to England. He did not take Mamie with him, for he only intended to remain a few days, nor had she been at all desirous of accompanying him. She had begun, indeed, to see that she did not know what she did desire. Her life in Paris oppressed her; the notion of Duluth was horrible; and the thought of living with Lucas in London, where she might meet an acquaintance of Heriot's at any turn, was repugnant in an almost equal degree.

Field was unexpectedly detained in London. The business which had been responsible for his journey constantly evaded completion, and after he had been gone about a month a letter came, in which he mentioned incidentally that he had contracted a touch of influenza. After this letter a fortnight went by without her hearing from him, and, rendered anxious at last, she wrote to inquire if his silence was attributable to his indisposition — if the latter was of a serious nature.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Her mind did not instantaneously grasp the significance of the telegram that she tore open a few hours later. It ran :

“My nephew dangerously ill. If you desire to see him, better come.—PORTEOUS.”

She stood gazing at it. Who had telegraphed? Who—— Then she understood that it was Lucas who was meant. Lucas was “dangerously ill”! She must go to him. She must go at once! She was so staggered by the suddenness of the intelligence that she was momentarily incapable of recollecting when the trains left, or how she should act in order to ascertain. All she realized was that this was Paris, and Lucas lay “dangerously ill” in London, and that she had to reach him. Her head swam, and the little French she knew seemed to desert her ; the undertaking looked enormous — beset with difficulties that were almost insuperable.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The stupidity of the bonne, for whom she pealed the bell, served to sharpen her faculties a trifle, but she made her preparations as if in a dream. When she found herself in the train, it appeared to her unreal that she could be there. The interval had left no salient impressions on her brain, nothing but a confused sense of delay. It was only now that she felt able to reflect.

The telegram was crumpled in her pocket, and she took it out and re-read it agitatedly. How did this relative come to be at the hotel? Lucas had scarcely spoken of his relations. "If you desire to see him"! The import of those words was frightful—he could not be expected to recover! Her stupefaction rolled away, and was succeeded by a fever of suspense. The restriction of the compartment was maddening, and she looked at her watch a dozen times, only to find that not ten minutes had passed since she consulted it last.

It seemed to her that she had been travelling for at least two days, when she stood outside a bedroom door in a little hotel off Bond Street, and tapped at the panels with her heart in her throat.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The door was opened by a woman whose dress proclaimed her to be an institution nurse. Field slept, and Mamie sank into a chair, and waited for his wakening.

"How is he?" she asked in a low tone.

The nurse shook her head.

"He's not doing as well as we could wish, ma'am."

"Is Mr. Porteous here?"

"Mrs. Porteous! She'll be coming presently. She lives close by."

So it was a woman who had telegraphed! Somehow she had assumed unquestioningly that it was a man. "If you desire to see him——" Ah, yes, she might have known it! An aunt, who would be frigid and contemptuous, of course. Well, she deserved that, she would have no right to complain; nor was it to be expected that Lucas's family should show her much consideration, though she could not perceive that she had done them any injury.

It was two hours before her interview with the lady took place. Mamie was in the room she had engaged in the meanwhile, and had bathed her face, and was making ready to return to the sick-chamber when she was told that Mrs. Porteous was inquiring for her.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Won't you come in?" she asked. "Our voices will not disturb him here."

Mrs. Porteous entered gingerly. She was a massive woman, of middle age, fashionably dressed. Her expression suggested no grief, only a vague fear of contamination. She had telegraphed to Paris because she felt that it was her duty to do so; but she had not cabled until it was almost certain that the patient would not rally sufficiently to make a will.

"You are—er—Mrs. Heriot?" she said, regarding her curiously. "The doctor advised that Mr. Field's condition should be made known to you; so I wired."

"Thank you; it was very kind."

"The doctor advised it," said Mrs. Porteous again, significantly.

"Is he—is there no hope?"

"We fear not; my nephew is sinking fast—it's as well you should understand it. If you think it necessary to remain—I see you have taken a room? As—as 'Mrs. Field,' I presume?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I should have been 'Mrs. Field,' if Lucas _____"

His aunt shivered.

"There are things we need not discuss. Of course I am aware that you are living under my nephew's name. I was about to say that if you think it necessary to remain until the end, I have no opposition to offer; but the end is very near now. My telegram must have prepared you? I should not have wired unless——"

"I understood," answered Mamie; "yes, I am glad that your nephew had a relative near him, though your name was quite unfamiliar to me. He never mentioned it."

"Really! Lucas called to see us at once. Our house is in the neighbourhood."

"He wrote me," said Mamie, "that he had a touch of influenza. It seems extraordinary that influenza should prove so serious? He was strong, he was in good health——"

The other's air implied that she did not find it necessary to discuss this either.

"People die of influenza or the results every year," she said. "The doctor will give you any information you may desire, no doubt. You must excuse me—I may be wanted."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

While Field lingered she never left his side after Mamie's arrival. Men committed preposterous actions on their death-beds, and though it was not anticipated that he would recover consciousness, there was always the possibility of such a thing happening. If an opportunity occurred, his mistress would doubtless produce a solicitor and a provision for herself with the rapidity of a conjuring trick; and, as it was, Mrs. Porteous had small misgivings but what he would die intestate. There might not be much, but what there was should at least not swell the coffers of guilty wives!

Events proved that her summons had not been precipitate, however. Field spoke at the last a few coherent words, and took Mamie's hand. But that was all. Then he never spoke any more. Even as she stood gazing at the inanimate form under the sheet, the swiftness of the catastrophe made it difficult for the girl to realize that all was over. The calamity had fallen on her like a thunderbolt—it seemed strange, inexplicable, untrue. The last time but one on which he had talked to her he had been full of vigour, packing a portmanteau, humming a tune, alluding to fees, some details of the theatre, the prospect of a smooth crossing. And now he was dead! There had been little or no transition; he was well—he was dead! The curtain had tumbled in the middle of the play—and it would never go up any more.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

It was not until after the funeral that she was capable of meditating upon the change in her life that was wrought by Lucas Field's death. She did not ask herself whether he had left her anything or not. The idea that he might have done so never occurred to her, nor would she have felt that she could accept his bequest, if he had made one. She perceived that she had nobody to turn to but her father, and to him she cabled.

Cheriton replied by two questions: What was Field's will? and would she like to return to Duluth? To the latter she gave a definite answer. "Impossible; pray don't ask me." And then there was an interval of correspondence.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

While Mrs. Porteous was delighted to find her confidence justified, and that her nephew had died intestate, Mamie was face to face with the alternative of swallowing her repugnance to going back to America, or of living with Mrs. Baines. Cheriton had written to them both, and on one course or the other being adopted he was insistent. Mamie need not live in Lavender Street unless she chose; Mrs. Baines might make her home in another neighbourhood where they would be strangers. But that the girl should remain in England alone was out of the question. Which line of conduct did she prefer?

She could not immediately decide. Both proposals distressed her. On the whole, perhaps, the lesser evil was to resign herself to her Aunt Lydia if, as her father declared, her aunt was willing to receive her. Mrs. Baines, at any rate, was but one, while in Duluth half the population, and more than that, would be acquainted with her story.

But was her Aunt Lydia willing? Was she expected to write to her, and inquire? She was not entitled to possess dignity, of course; but it was not easy to eat dust because the right to self-respect was forfeited.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

She had removed to a lodging in Bernard Street, Bloomsbury, and in the fusty sitting-room she sat all day, lonely and miserable, reviewing the blunder of her life. She neither wrote nor read—her writing was an idea she hated now ; she merely thought ; wishing she could recall the past, wondering how she could bear the future. One afternoon when she sat there, pale and heavy-eyed, the maid-of-all-work announced a visitor, and Mrs. Baines came in.

Mamie rose nervously, and the other advanced. She had rehearsed an interview which should be a compromise between the instructions laid upon her by her brother, and the attitude of righteous rebuke that she had felt to be a permissible luxury, but the forlornness of the figure before her drove her opening sentence from her head. All she could say was the girl's name ; and then there was a pause in which they looked at each other.

"It is kind of you to come," Mamie murmured.

"I hope you are well?" said Mrs. Baines.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Not very. I—— Won't you sit down?"

"I never thought I should see you like this, Mamie," said the widow half involuntarily, shaking her head.

The girl made no answer in words. She caught her breath, and stood passive. If the lash fell she would suffer silently.

"Sin always brings its own punishment, though"—she believed it always did; she had such startling optimisms—"it's not for me to reproach you."

"Thank you! I am not too happy, Aunt Lydia."

"I daresay, my dear. I haven't come to make it worse for you."

She scrutinized her again. She would have been horrified to hear the suggestion, but her niece's presence was not without a guilty fascination, a pleasurable excitement, to her as she remembered that here was one who had broken the Seventh Commandment. She was sitting opposite a girl who had lived in Paris with a lover; and she was sitting opposite her under circumstances which redounded to her own credit!

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I have heard from your father," she went on; "I suppose you know?"

"Yes," said Mamie; "he has written me."

"And do you wish to make your home with me again? I am quite ready to take you if you like."

"I could never live in Lavender Street any more, Aunt Lydia. You must understand that—that it would be awful to me!"

"Your father hinted at my moving. It will be a great trouble, but I shan't shirk my duty, dear Mamie. If it will make your burden any easier to bear, we will live together somewhere else. I say, if I can make your burden any easier for you, I will live somewhere else."

"I am not ungrateful. I—yes, if you will have me, I should like to come to you."

Mrs. Baines sighed, and smoothed her skirt tremulously.

"To Balham?" she inquired.

"You are moving to Balham?"

"I was thinking about it. I was over there the other day to get some stuff for a bodice. It's nice and healthy, with the Commons and what not, and the shopping is cheap."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"It is all the same to me where we go," said Mamie, "so long as the people don't know me."

"I hear you were living with—with him in Paris? Operas, and drives, and all manner of things to soothe your conscience he gave you, I've no doubt?" said Mrs. Baines, in an awe-struck invitation to communicativeness. "After that terrible life in Paris, Balham will seem quiet to you, I daresay; but perhaps you won't mind that?"

"No place can be too quiet for me. The quieter it is, the better I shall like it."

"That's as it should be! Though, I suppose, with 'him,' you were out among gaieties every night?" She waited for a few particulars again. As none were forthcoming: "Then I'll try to let the house, and we'll go over together and look at some in Balham as soon as you like, my dear," she continued. "Your father will see that I'm not put to any expense. In the meantime you'll stay where you are, eh? You know—you know I saw Mr. Heriot after you'd gone, don't you?"

"No," stammered the girl, lifting eager eyes. "You went to him?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"The very next day, my dear, so it seemed! I thought I'd drop in and have a cup of tea with you, not having seen you for so long; and through missing a train, and having such a time to wait at the station, I was an hour and more late when I got to Kensington. He was at home. Of course I had no suspicion there was anything wrong; I shall never forget it—never! You might have knocked me down with a feather, as the saying is, when I heard you'd gone!"

"What," muttered Mamie, "what did he say?"

"It was like this. I said to him, 'Dear Mamie's away, the servant tells me?' For naturally I thought you were visiting friends. 'As likely as not, she's with his family,' I said to myself. 'Oh, yes,' he said, 'you must prepare yourself for a shock, Mrs. Baines—my wife has left me.' 'Left you?' I said. 'Yes,' said he, so cool that it turned me a mask of blood to hear him, 'she's gone away with a lover.' 'Mr. Heriot!' I exclaimed—I was almost pinching myself to see if I was awake—'Mister Heriot!' 'She left a note,' he said, 'so it's all right! Do you think we need talk about it much? I don't know that a worthless woman is any loss,' he said."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"He said that?"

"Those were his very words, my dear. But how cool I can't give you an idea! I stared at him. I'd no mind to make excuses for you, Gawd knows; but, for all that, one's own flesh and blood wasn't going to be talked about like niggers, or what not, in my hearing. When I got my wits together, I said, 'It seems to me I'd be sorrier for you, Mr. Heriot, if you took it different.' 'Oh,' said he in a superior way, 'would you? We needn't discuss my feelings, madam. Perhaps you'll stay and dine?' I was so angry that I couldn't be civil to him. 'I thank you,' I said, 'I will not stay and dine. And I take the opportunity, Mr. Heriot, of telling you you're a brute!' With that I came away; but there was much more in between that I've forgotten—about the divorce it was! He said he had 'a duty to himself,' and that the man could marry you when you were divorced; which I suppose he would have done if he had lived? though whether your sin would have been any less, my dear, if an archbishop had performed the ceremony is a question that I couldn't undertake to decide. You must begin your life afresh, now that it's all 'absolute,'—which I learn is the proper term,—and you'll never be in a newspaper any more! Pray to Heaven for aid, and take heart of grace! And if it will relieve you to speak sometimes of those sinful months with—with the other one in Paris, why, you shall talk about them to me, my dear, and I won't reproach you."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Mamie was no longer listening. An emotion that she did not seek to define was roused in her as she wondered if Heriot could indeed have taken the blow so stoically as her aunt declared. She scarcely knew whether she wished to put faith in his demeanour or not, but the subject was one that filled her thoughts long after Mrs. Baines' departure. It was one to which she constantly recurred, too.

With less delay than might have been anticipated, the widow found a house in Balham which fulfilled her requirements, and the removal was effected several months before No. 20, Lavender Street, was sub-let.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The houses of this class differ from one another but slightly. Excepting that the one in Balham was numbered "44," and that the street was called "Rosalie Road," Mamie could have found it easy to believe that she was re-installed in Wandsworth. Such villas are, for the most part, the crown of lives too limited to realize their limitations—too unsuccessful to be aware that they have failed. The residents' strongest characteristic is a scorn of the gentlepeople who live in lodgings. "Lodgings" are mentioned here with the same horror which, in a still lower grade, is inspired by the name of the workhouse. In Rosalie Road they have "a house to themselves"! Banners of victory, the "washing" swirls till nightfall on their own clothes-props; each morning the odour of bacon floats into their own back-yard! In such regions breakfast means bacon every day of the week—bacon all the year round. Children are born, and develop into clerks, and beget more clerks, and are buried, never having known any other. "Breakfast" is a synonym for "bacon" here. Beyond bacon and tea, a lump of meat, and the boiled potato, the culinary imagination does not soar; nor could the slatternly "servant-girls," to whom such mistresses are slaves, rise to any farther height if required. The latter have attained, however—Mecca of the middle-classes!—"a house to themselves"; and the burden of the dreadful little domiciles bowing their weary backs, they view the comparative refinement of furnished apartments with contempt; forced to submit to the vagaries of a dilatory drab, if they would not be left without a servant at all, they boast of their own "independence"!

ONE MAN'S VIEW

To Rosalie Road, Balham, with her Aunt Lydia for companion, the divorcée at the age of twenty-six retired to remember that she had once hoped to be an artist, and had had the opportunity of being a happy woman.

To-day she hoped for nothing. There was no scope for hope. If she could have awakened to find herself famous, her existence would have been coloured a little,—though she knew that fame could never satisfy her now as it would once have done,—but the ability to labour for distinction was quite gone. She was apathetic, she had no interest in anything. When six months had passed, she regarded death as the only event to which she could still look forward ; when she had been here a year, a glimmer of relief entered into her depression—the doctor who had attended her, and sounded her lungs, told her that she “ must take care of herself.”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Sometimes a neighbour looked in, and spoke of the dilapidations of a kitchen range, and the indifference of the landlord, the reductions at a High Road linen draper's, and the whooping-cough. Sometimes a curate called to sell tickets for a concert more elementary than his sermons. In the afternoon she walked to Tooting Bec, and stared at the bushes ; in the evening she betook herself to the “ circulating library,” where the most recent additions were Lady Audley's Secret and The Wide, Wide World, and the proprietor said he hadn't heard of Meredith ; “ perhaps she had made a mistake in the name ? ” God help her ! She was guilty, and she had left a husband desolate ; but the music she had dreamed of was the opera on “ Wagner nights,” when the box would have been full of men and women who also wore their bays ; the books she had expected had been “ presentation copies,” containing signatures which were the envy of the autograph-collector ; the circle that had been her aim was the world of Literature and Art. She lived in Balham ; she saw the curate, and she heard about the range in the neighbour's kitchen. One year merged into another ; and if she lived for forty more, the neighbour and the curate would be her All.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

CHAPTER XI

WHEN five had passed after the divorce, the Liberal Party came into power again, and George Heriot, Q.C., M.P., was appointed Solicitor-General. His work and ambitions had not sufficed to mend the gap which his wife had left in his life; but it had been in work and ambition that he endeavoured to find assuagement of the wound. Perhaps eagerness had never been so keen in him after she went as while he was contesting the borough that he represented; perhaps he had never realized the inadequacy of success so fully as he did to-day when one of the richest prizes of his profession was obtained. Conscious that the anticipated flavour was lacking, the steps to which he might look forward still lost much of their allurements.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Were he promoted to the post of Attorney-General, and raised to the Bench, he could foresee that the gratification would be no more keen than he experienced now, when as Sir George Heriot, and a very wealthy man, he recalled the period in which, a struggling Junior, he had sat up half the night to earn a guinea.

The five years had left their mark upon him ; the hours of misery which no one suspected had left their mark upon him. The lines about the eyes and mouth had deepened ; his hair was greyer, his figure less erect. Men who, in their turn, sat up half the night to earn a guinea, envied him, cited his career as an example of brilliant luck—the success of others is always “luck”—and, though they assumed that a fellow was “generally cut up a bit when his wife went wrong,” found it difficult to conceive that Sir George had permitted domestic trouble to alloy his triumphs in any marked degree. Nobody imagined that there were still nights in which he suffered scarcely less acutely than on the one when he returned to discover that Mamie had gone—that there were evenings when his loneliness was almost unbearable to the dry, self-contained man—that moments came when he took from a drawer the likeness that had stood on his desk once, and yearned over it with despair. That was his secret ; pride forbade that he should share it with another. He contemned himself that he did suffer still. A worthless woman should not be mourned. Out of his life should be out of his memory ; such weakness shamed him.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

In August, a week or so after the vacation commenced, he went to stay at Fairlawn. His object in going to Fairlawn was not wholly to see his brother, and still less was it to see his sister-in-law. He was solitary, he was wretched, and he was only forty-seven years of age. He had been questioning for some time whether the wisest thing he could do would not be to marry again ; he sought no resumption of rapture, but he wanted a home. An estimable wife, perhaps a son, would supply new interests ; and the vague question that had entered his mind had latterly been emphasized by his introduction to Miss Pierways, who, he was aware, was now the guest of Lady Heriot.

Miss Pierways was the daughter of a lady who had been the Hon. Mrs. Pierways, and who had been left in such straitened circumstances, that she was even debarred from accepting the suite in Hampton Court that had been offered to her at the period of her husband's death. The mother and the girl had retired to obscure lodgings ; the only break in the monotony of the latter's existence being an occasional visit to some connections or friends, at whose places it was hoped she might form a desirable alliance. The most stringent economies had to be practised in order to procure passable frocks for these visits, but the opportunities led to no result, though she had beauty. And then an extraordinary event occurred. When the girl was twenty-eight, the widow who for once had reluctantly accepted an invitation to accompany her, received an offer of marriage herself, and became the wife of an American who was known to be several times over a millionaire !

ONE MAN'S VIEW

For one door that had been ajar to the daughter of the Hon. Mrs. Pierways, with nothing but her birth and her appearance to recommend her, a hundred flew open to the step-daughter of Henry Van Buren ; and it was shortly after the startling metamorphosis in the fortunes of the pair that Heriot had first met them.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The possible dowry which Agnes Pierways would bring to her husband weighed with him very little, for he was in a position to disregard such considerations; but Miss Pierways' personality appeared to him suggestive of all the qualifications that he sought in the lady he should marry. Without her manner being impulsive or girlish, she was sufficiently young to be attractive. She was handsome, and in a slightly statuesque fashion that bore the promise of the serenity which he told himself was now his aim. Certainly if he did re-marry—and he was contemplating the step very seriously—it would be difficult to secure a partner who fulfilled his requirements more admirably than Miss Pierways. Whether he fulfilled hers, he could ascertain when he had fully made up his mind. It was with the intention of making up his mind in proximity to the lady that he had come to Fairlawn; and one evening, when he was alone in the smoking-room with his brother, the latter blundered curiously enough on to the bull's-eye of his meditations.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I wonder," said Sir Francis, "that you've never thought of re-marrying, George?"

"My experience of matrimony was not fortunate," answered Heriot, smoking slowly, but with inward perturbation.

"Your experience of matrimony was a colossal folly. All things considered, the consequences might easily have been a good deal worse."

"I don't follow you."

"Between ourselves, the end never seemed to me so regrettable as you think it."

"My wife left me."

"And you divorced her! And you have no children."

"If I had had children," said Heriot musingly, "it is a fact that the consequences would have been worse."

"But in any case," said the baronet, "it was a huge mistake. Really one may be frank under the circumstances. You married madly. The probability is that if your wife had been—if you were living together still, you would be a miserable man to-day. It was a very lamentable affair, of course, when it happened, but regarding it coolly—in looking back on it—don't you fancy that perhaps things are just as well as they are?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I was very fond of my wife," replied Heriot, engrossed by his cigar.

"To an extent," said Sir Francis indulgently, "no doubt you had an affection for her. But, my dear fellow, what companionship had you? Was she a companion?"

"I don't know."

"Was she interested in your career? Could she understand your ways of thought? Was she used to your world? One doesn't ask a great deal of women, but had you any single thing in common?"

"I don't know," said Heriot again.

Sir Francis shrugged his shoulders.

"Take my word for it that, with such a girl as you married, your divorce was not an un-mixed evil. It wasn't the release one would have chosen, but at least it was better for you than being tied to her for life. Damn it, George! what's the use of blinking the matter now? She was absolutely unsuited to you in every way; you must admit it!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I suppose she was. At the same time I was happy with her."

"How long would the infatuation have lasted?"

"It lasted more than three years."

"Would it have lasted another five?"

"Speaking honestly, I believe it would."

"Though you had nothing in common!"

"I don't explain," said Heriot. "I tell you, I was happy with her, that's all! Viewing it dispassionately, I suppose she was unsuited to me. I don't know that we did have anything in common; I don't see any justification for the fool's paradise I lived in. But for all that, if I married again, I should never care for the woman as—as I cared for her. In fact, I should merely marry to——" —he was about to say "to try to forget her"—"to make a home for myself," he said, instead.

"Have you considered such a step?" asked Sir Francis.

"Sometimes, yes."

"The best thing you could do—a very proper thing for you to do. . . . Anybody in particular?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"It's rather premature——"

"You're not in chambers, old fellow!"

"What do you think of Miss Pierways?" inquired Heriot after a scarcely perceptible pause.

"A very excellent choice! I should congratulate you heartily. I had not noticed—— And Catherine is very acute in these matters——"

"There has been nothing to notice; probably she would refuse me point-blank. But in the event of my determining to marry again, I've wondered whether Miss Pierways wouldn't be the lady I proposed to."

"I don't think you could do better."

"Really? You don't think I'm too old for her?"

"On my honour! 'Too old for her?' Not a bit, a very sensible marriage. I'm not surprised that you should be attracted by her."

"'Attracted by her,'" said Heriot, "suggests rather more than the actual facts. I appreciate her qualities, but I can't say I'm sensible of any attachment. I'm sorry that I'm not. I appreciate her so fully that I am anxious to be drawn towards her a little more. I'm somewhat past the age for ardent devotion, but I couldn't take a wife as I might buy a horse. Of course, I've not been very much in her society ; er—down here, I daresay, when I come to know her better—— Have you met Van Buren ?”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“In town, before he sailed. He is in New York, you know. I like them all. We were very pleased to have the mother and the girl to stay with us. . . : Well, make your hay while the sun shines.”

“It isn't shining,” said Heriot ; “I'm just looking east, waiting for it to rise. But I'm glad to have talked to you ; as soon as the first gleam comes I think I'll take your advice. I ought to marry, Francis ; I know you're right.”

CHAPTER XII

THE more he reflected the more he was convinced of it. In marriage lay his chance of contentment, and during the ensuing fortnight his approval of Miss Pierways deepened. The house would not fill until the following month, and the smallness of the party there at present was favourable to the development of acquaintance.

Excepting that she was a trifle cold, there was really no scope for adverse criticism upon Miss Pierways. She was unusually well read, took an intelligent interest in matters on which women of her age were rarely informed, and was accomplished to the extent that she played the piano after dinner with brilliant execution and admirable hands and wrists. Her coldness, theoretically, was no drawback to him, and

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Heriot was a little puzzled by his own attitude. Her air was neither so formal as to intimate that his advances would be unwelcome, nor so self-conscious as to repel him by the warmth of its encouragement ; yet, in spite of his admiration, the idea of proposing to her dismayed him when he forced himself to approach the brink.

His vacillation was especially irritating since he had learned that the ladies were on the point of joining Mr. Van Buren in New York. The opportunity of which he was failing to take advantage would speedily be past, and he dreaded that if he suffered it to escape him, he would recall the circumstances with a certain regret. He perceived as well, however, that if he were precipitate, he might regret that too, and he was sorry that the pair were not remaining in Europe longer.

One evening shortly before their departure, which was being discussed, the mother expressed surprise that he should never have been curious to visit a continent, to which she had never given a thought herself until she married an American, and in answer Heriot declared that he had frequently meditated taking a run across during the long vacation.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"If you ever do," she said, "I hope you will choose a year when we are there."

"To tell you the truth, I was thinking of it during the present one."

"We may see you in New York, Sir George?" said Miss Pierways. "Really? How strange that will seem! I've been anxious to go to New York all my life; but now that I'm going, I feel a contradictory desire to stay at home. The idea of a large city across a lot of water, where I haven't any friends——"

"But you will have many friends, Agnes."

"By-and-by," answered Miss Pierways. "Yes, I suppose so. But it's very fatiguing making friends, don't you think so? And I tremble when I contemplate the voyage."

"How delightful it would be," remarked Mrs. Van Buren, "if we were going by the same steamer, Sir George!"

Heriot laughed.

"It would be very delightful to me to make the voyage in your company. But I might bore you frightfully. A week at sea must be a severe test. I should be afraid of being found out."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"We are promised other passengers," observed Miss Pierways, looking down with a faint smile. Her archness was a shade stiff, but her neck was one of her chief attractions.

"Why don't you go, George?" said Lady Heriot cheerfully. "You'd much better go by Mrs. Van Buren's boat than any other; and you've been talking of making a trip to America 'next year' ever since I've known you!"

This amiable fiction was succeeded by fresh protestations on Mrs. Van Buren's part that no arrangement could be more charming, and Heriot, half against his will, half with pleasure, found himself agreeing to telegraph in the morning to inquire if he could obtain a berth.

He hardly knew whether he was sorry or glad when he had done so. That the step would result in an engagement might be predicted with a tolerable degree of certainty, and he would have preferred to arrive at an understanding with himself under conditions which savoured less of coercion.

Since a state-room proved to be vacant, however, he could do no less than engage it now ; and everybody appeared so pleased, and Miss Pierways was so gracious, that the anomalous misgivings which disturbed him looked momentarily more unreasonable than ever.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The night before he sailed, in their customary colloquy over whisky and cigars, Sir Francis said to him :

“ Ask, and it shall be given unto you ! ”

“ I'm inclined to think you're right,” said his brother. “ I suppose it will end in it! . . . She's a trifle like a well-bred machine—doesn't it strike you so?—warranted never to get out of order ! ” The other's look was significant, and Heriot added, “ Very desirable in a wife, of course! Only somehow —— ”

“ Only somehow ! you're eccentric, George—you always were ! ”

“ It's not my reputation,” said Heriot drily ; “ I believe that I'm esteemed particularly practical.”

“ Reputations,” retorted the baronet, attempting an epigram, as he sometimes did in the course of the second whisky-and-potash, and failing signally in the endeavour, “ are like tombstones—generally false!” He realized the reality of tombstones, and became immediately controversial, to mask the defeat. “I’ve known you from a boy, and I say you were always eccentric. It was nothing but your eccentricity that you had to thank before! Here’s a nice girl, a girl who will certainly have a good settlement, a girl who’s undeniably handsome, ready to say ‘yes’ at the asking, and you grumble—I’m hanged if you don’t grumble!—because you see she is to be depended on. What the devil do you want?”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“I want to be fond of her,” answered Heriot. “I admit all you’ve said of her; I want to like her more.”

“So you ought to; but what does it matter if you don’t? All women are alike to the men who’ve married them after a year or two. She’ll make an admirable mother, and that’s the main thing, I suppose!”

Was it?

Heriot recalled the criticism during his first day on board. Neither of the ladies was visible until Queenstown was reached, and he paced the deck pursuing his reflections by the aid of tobacco. She would "make an admirable mother, and that was the main thing"! Of the second half of the opinion he was not so sure. To marry a woman simply because one believed she would shine in a maternal capacity was somewhat too altruistic, he thought. However, he was fully aware that Miss Pierways had other recommendations.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

She appeared with her mother at the head of the companion-way while he was wishing that he had not come, and he found their chairs for them, and arranged their rugs, and subsequently gave their letters to the steward to be posted.

After leaving Queenstown, Mrs. Van Buren's sufferings increased, and the girl, who, saving for a brief interval, was well and cheerful, was practically in his charge. It was Heriot who accompanied her from the saloon after breakfast, and strolled up and down with her till she was tired. When the chair and the rug—the salient features of a voyage are the chair, the rug, and the woman—were satisfactorily arranged, it was he who sat beside her talking. Flying visits she made below, while her mother kept her cabin; but she was on deck for the most part—or in the saloon, or in the reading-room—and for the most part Heriot was the person to whom she looked for conversation. If he had been a decade or two younger, he would probably have proposed to her long before they sighted Sandy Hook, and it surprised him that he did not succumb to the situation as it was. A woman is nowhere so dangerous, and nowhere is a man so susceptible, as at sea. The interminable days demand flirtation, if one is not to perish of boredom; and the environment is conducive to the development of flirtation into the semblance of love. Moonlight and water are notoriously potent, even when only viewed for half an hour; and at sea, the man and the girl look at the moonlight on the water together regularly every evening. And it is very becoming to the girl. Miss Pierways' face was always a disappointment to Heriot at breakfast. The remembrance of its factitious softness the previous night made its hardness in the sunshine look harder. He wondered if it was the remembrance of its hardness at breakfast that kept him from proposing to her when they loitered in the moonlight. He was certainly doing his best to fall in love with her, and everything conspired to assist him ; but the days went on, and the momentous question remained unuttered.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"We shall soon be there," she said one evening as they strolled about the deck after dinner. "I'm beginning to be eager. Have you noticed how everybody who passes is saying, 'New York' now? At first no one alluded to our arrival—we mightn't have been due for a year, by the way the subject was ignored—and since yesterday nobody is talking of anything else!"

"Nearly every one I've spoken to seems to have made the trip half a dozen times," said Heriot. "I feel dreadfully untravelled in the smoking-room. When are you going to Niagara, Miss Pierways? That's a solemn duty to a foreigner, you know."

"But it isn't to a native! I was talking to some girls who have lived in New York all their lives—when they weren't in Europe—and haven't been there yet! They told me they had been to the panorama in Westminster!"

"The average thinking man can't stand Europe for more than six months," Heriot remarked. "I heard that this morning! I fancy Americans are the most patriotic people in the world; they are even angry with themselves for liking any country but their own!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Well, there is a great deal of it to like!"

"Yes, I wish I had time to see more. I should like to go west; I should like to see California."

"I wouldn't see California for any consideration upon earth!" Miss Pierways declared. "California, to me, is Bret Harte—I should be so afraid of being disillusioned. When we went to Ireland once, do you know, Sir George, it was a most painful shock to me! My ideas of Ireland were based on Dion Boucicault's plays; I expected to see all the peasants in fascinating costumes, with their hair down their backs, just as one sees them on the stage. The reality was terrible. I shudder when I recall the disappointment I suffered."

"I can appreciate it."

"Of course you're laughing at me?"

"Disinterested sympathy is always doubted!"

"I shall have my revenge, if you don't like New York," she said. "But, I don't know! I shall feel guilty. You musn't blame us if you don't like New York, Sir George. Fortunately you won't have time to be very bored, though; will you?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"'Fortunately'?"

"Fortunately if it doesn't amuse you, I mean. When does the—how do you say it? When does your holiday end?"

"I must be back in London on the twenty-fourth of next month. I am almost American myself, am I not? I shall have such a fleeting glimpse of the country, that I must really think of writing a book about it."

"You have something better to do than writing vapid books! To me your profession seems the most interesting one there is. If I were a man, I would rather be called to the Bar than anything. You would be astonished if you knew how many biographies of eminent lawyers I have read—they enthralled me as a child. I don't know any career that conveys such a sense of power to me as the Bar. Don't smile; but sometimes when we are talking I look at you, remembering the vital issues that have been in your hands, and tremble."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

She lifted her eyes to him, deprecating the enthusiasm which was too palpably a pose, and again Heriot was conscious that the opportunity was with him, if he could but grasp it. They had paused by the taffrail, and he stood looking at her, trying to speak the words which would translate their relations to a definite footing. He no longer had any doubt as to her answer; he could foresee her reply—at least the manner of her reply—with disturbing clearness. He knew that she would hesitate an instant, and droop her head, and ultimately murmur correct phrases which would exhilarate him not at all. In imagination he already heard her tones, as she promised to be his wife. He supposed, as they were screened from observation, that he might take her hand. How passionless, how mechanical and flat it would all be! He replied with a common-place, and after a few moments they continued their promenade. When he turned in, however, he reproached himself more forcibly than he had done yet, and his vacillation was by no means at an end. He was not at war with his judgment, but with his instinct, and it was the perception of this fact which always increased his perturbation.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

They landed the following day, and, after being introduced to Mr. Van Buren in the custom-house, Heriot drove to an hotel. The hotel was excellent, but the city did not appear to him the brilliant capital that he had understood it to be. He had vaguely pictured New York as a Paris, where everybody talked English ; and the arid, ill-paved streets, the ceaseless jangle of the surface-cars, and the ubiquitous rush and scream of the Elevated Railway, at once irritated and oppressed him. He did not wish to take the Van Burens' invitations too literally, and to a man or woman who has few acquaintances there, New York is a duller capital than most. While rendering homage to the cuisine of the country, which, as a whole, is infinitely better than the cooking of France, and as superior to that of England as the worst American train is to our best, the place, as a place, disappointed him woefully. Broadway, narrow and abominable, till it widened into the momentary brightness of Union Square, proved a shock in its painful dissimilarity to the Boulevard des Italiens, with which the few American novels into which he had dipped had led him to associate it; and Fifth Avenue, when he called on the Van Burens, had so little external resemblance to the description of a "street of palaces," that in the middle of the thoroughfare, he begged a pedestrian to tell him where it was.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

American hospitality, however, is the most charming in the world, and he spent several very agreeable hours inside the big brown-stone house. Nothing could have exceeded the geniality of Mr. Van Buren's manner, nor was this due solely to the position of his visitor, and a hope of their becoming connected. The average American business man will show more kindness to a complete stranger, who intrudes into his office, than most Englishmen display to one who comes to them with the warmest letter of introduction from a bosom-friend, and Van Buren's welcome was as sincere as it was attractive.

Heriot stayed in New York a week, and then fulfilled his desire of visiting Niagara. On his return he called at Fifth Avenue again.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

He was already beginning to refer to his homeward voyage, and he was still undetermined whether he would propose to Miss Pierways or not. The days slipped by without his arriving at a conclusion ; and then one morning he told himself he had gone too far to retreat now, and that the step, which was doubtless the most judicious he could take, should be made without delay.

He called at the house the same afternoon—for on the next day but one the Etruria sailed—and he found the ladies at home. He sat down, wondering if he would be left alone with Miss Pierways, and take his departure engaged to her ; but for half an hour there seemed no likelihood of a tête-à-tête. Presently some cards were brought in, and the visitors were shown into another room. Mrs. Van Buren begged him to excuse her. He rose to leave, but was pressed to remain.

“I want to talk to you when they've gone,” she said ; “I haven't half exhausted my list of messages for you to take to London.”

Heriot resumed his seat, and Miss Pierways smiled.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Poor mamma wishes she were going herself, if the truth is told! Now that we're here, it is I who like New York the better."

"We soon become creatures of custom," he said; "your mother has lived in London too long to accustom herself to America very easily. Of course you'll be returning next season?"

"Oh, yes. Shall you ever come to America again, Sir George?"

"I—I hardly know," he answered. "I certainly hope to."

"Oh, then, you will! You are your own master."

"Is anybody ever his own master?"

"To the extent of travelling to America, many people, I should think!"

He remembered with sudden gratification that he had never said a word to her that he might not have spoken before a crowd of listeners. What was there to prevent him withholding the proposal if he liked!

"I've no doubt I shall come," he said abstractedly.

She looked slightly downcast. This was not the reply that she hoped to hear.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"I shall always owe a debt of gratitude to you and to Mr. and Mrs. Van Buren for making my visit so pleasant to me," he found himself saying next. "My trip has been a delightful experience."

She murmured a conventional response, but chagrin began to creep about her heart.

Heriot diverged into allusions which advanced the position not at all. They spoke of New England, of the voyage—she perceived and he with ever-increasing relief. He felt that he had been on the verge of the precipice for the last time. He had escaped—and by the intensity of his gratitude he realized how ill-judged had been his action in playing around it.

When Mrs. Van Buren re-appeared, followed by her husband, her daughter's face told her that the crisis had not been reached; and bold in thanksgiving, Heriot excused himself when he was asked to dine with them that evening. Had the invitation been transferred to the next, he could not without rudeness have found a pretext for refusing; but on the next night, as luck would have it, the Van Burens were dining out themselves.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

When the footman opened the big door he descended the steps with a sensation that was foreign to him, and not wholly agreeable. He knew he did not want to marry Miss Pierways, and that he had behaved like a fool in trying to acquire the desire, but he was a little ashamed of himself. His conduct had not been irreproachable; and he was conscious that when the steamer sailed, and the chapter was closed for good and all, he would be glad to have done with it. He had blundered badly. Nevertheless he would have blundered worse, and been a still greater fool, if the affair had terminated in an engagement. Of course his brother would say distasteful things when they met, and Lady Heriot would convey her extreme disapproval of him without saying anything. That he must put up with. Of two evils, he had at any rate chosen the lesser!

He repeated the assurance with still more conviction on Saturday morning during the quarter of an hour in which the cab rattled him over the villainous roads to the boat. The experience had been a lesson to him, and henceforward he was resolved that he would dismiss the idea of marriage from his mind. He saw his portmanteau deposited in his cabin, and returned to the deck as the steamer commenced to move. The decks were in the confusion that always reigns during the first hour on board. Passengers still hung at the taffrail, taking a farewell gaze at friends upon the landing-stage. The chairs were huddled in a heap, and stewards bustled about among the piles of luggage, importuned at every second step with instructions and inquiries.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The deep pulsations appeared to grow more regular; the long line of sheds that had been left, receded; and the figures of the friends were as little dark toys, waving specks of white. Even the most constant among the departing began to turn away now. The hastening stewards were importuned more frequently than before. Everybody was in a hurry, and all the women in the crowd that flocked below seemed uttering the words, "baggage" and "state-room," at the same time.

A few men were temporarily in possession of the deck, striding to and fro behind pipes or cigars. The regulation as to "No smoking abaft this" was not yet in force, or, at least, was at present disobeyed. Heriot sauntered along the length of promenade until it began to fill again. The mountain of chairs received attention—they were set out in a row under the awning. The deck took a dryness and a whiteness, and a few people sat down, and questioned inwardly if they would find one another companionable. He bent his steps to the smoking-room, but it was empty and uninviting thus early, and he forsook it after a few minutes. As the door slammed behind him, he came face to face with the woman who had been his wife!

ONE MAN'S VIEW

CHAPTER XIII

SHE approached—their gaze met—he had bowed, and passed her. Perhaps it had lasted a second, the mental convulsion in which he looked in her eyes; he did not know. He found a seat and sank into it, staring at the sky and sea, acutely conscious of nothing but her nearness. He could not tell whether it was despair or rejoicing that beat in him; he knew nothing but that the world had swayed, that life was in an instant palpitating and vivid—that he had seen her!

Then he knew that in the intensity of emotion that shook him body and brain, there was a thrill of joy, inexplicable but insistent. But when he rose at last, he dreaded that he might see her again.

He did not see her till evening, when he drew back at the door of the saloon as she came out. His features were imperturbable now, and betrayed nothing, though her own, before her head drooped, were piteous in appeal.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Heriot noted that she looked pale and ill, and that she wore a black dress with crape on it. He wondered whether she had lost her father or her aunt. Next morning he understood that it must be her father, for he saw her sitting inertly beside Mrs. Baines against the bulwark. So Dick Cheriton was dead! He had once been fond of Dick Cheriton. The stranger in the black frock had once slept in his arms, and borne his name! . . . The sadness of a lifetime weighed on his soul.

He perceived that she shunned him by every means in her power. But they were bound to meet; and then the same look would flash across her face that he had seen at the foot of the companion-way; its supplication and abasement wrung him. They were bound to meet! Horrible as the continual encounters grew, in the reading-room, on deck, or below, their lines crossed a dozen times between breakfast and eleven o'clock at night. The unavoidableness of these meetings became as torturous to Heriot as to her. He felt as if he had struck her as he saw her whiten and shrink when he passed her by. He hated himself soon for being here to cause her this intolerable pain.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

It was on the evening of the third day that her endurance broke down, and she made her petition. He recognised the voice of her messenger with a pang before he turned.

"Mrs. Baines!"

"You're surprised I should address you, Mr. Heriot," she said. "I shouldn't have, but she wants me to beg you to—to speak to her, if it's only for five minutes. She implores you humbly to let her speak to you! She made me ask you; I couldn't say 'no.'"

His pulses throbbed madly, and momentarily he could not reply.

"What purpose would it serve?" he said in tones he struggled to make firm.

"She can't bear it, Mr. Heriot—Sir Heriot, I should say; I was forgetting, I'm sure I beg your pardon! She 'implores you humbly to let her speak to you'; I was to use those words. Won't you consent? She is ill, she's dying."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Dying?" whispered Heriot by a physical effort.

She nodded slowly. "The doctor has told her! She won't be here long, poor girl! But whether she's to be pitied for it or not, it's hard to say; I don't think she'll be sorry to go. . . . My brother is gone, Sir Heriot."

His answer was inarticulate.

"We got there just at the end. If we had been too late, she—— She has been ailing a long while, but we didn't know it was so serious. When she saw you, it was awful for her. I—— Oh, what am I to tell her?—she's waiting now!"

"Where?" said Heriot hoarsely.

"Will you come with me?"

"Show me," he said; "show me where she is."

He still heard the knell of it—"Dying!" It tolled in his being. He heard it as the lonely figure in the darkness rose:—

"Thank you, I am grateful."

The familiar voice knocked at his heart.

"Mrs. Baines has told me you are ill. I am grieved to learn how ill you are!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"It doesn't matter. It was good of you to come; I thought you would. I—I have prayed to speak to you again!"

"It was not much to ask," he said; "I—am human."

He could see she trembled painfully. He indicated the chair she had left, and drew one closer for himself. Then for some minutes there was silence.

"Do you hate me?" she said.

He shook his head. "Should I have come to tell you so?"

"But you can never forgive?"

"Why distress yourself? If for a moment I hesitated to come, it was because I knew it would be distressing for you. Perhaps a refusal would have been kinder after all."

"No, no; I was sure you wouldn't refuse. She doubted; but I was sure! I said you would come when you heard about me."

"Is it so serious? What is it? Tell me; I know nothing."

"It's my lungs; they were never very strong, you remember. The doctor told me in Duluth: 'Perhaps a year,' if I am 'very careful.' I am not very careful—it will soon be all over. Don't look like that. Why should you care? I don't care—I don't want to live a bit. Only—— Do you think, if—if there's anything afterwards, that a woman who's gone wrong like me will be punished?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"For God's sake," he said, "don't talk so!"

"But do you? It makes one think of these things when one knows one has only a very little time to live. You can't forgive me—you said so."

"I do," he said; "I forgive you freely. If I could give my life to undo your wretchedness, I'd give it you. You don't know how I loved you; what it meant to me to find you gone! Ah, Mamie, how could you do it?"

The tears stood in her eyes, as she lifted her white face to him in the obscurity.

"I am ashamed, ashamed!" she moaned. "What can I say?"

"Why?" said Heriot, at the end of a tense pause; "why? Did you care for him so much? If he had lived, and married you, would you be happy now?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Happy!" she echoed, with something between a laugh and a sob.

"Tell me! I hoped you would be happy. That's true! I never wanted you to suffer for what you'd done. I suffered enough for both."

"I don't think I should have married him. I don't know. I don't think so. I knew I'd made a mistake before—oh, in the first month. If you haven't hated me, I have hated myself."

"And since? You have been with her?"

"Ever since. My poor father wanted me to go home. I wish I had! You know I've lost him—she told you that? He wanted me to go home, but I couldn't—where everybody knew! You understand? And then she moved to Balham, and we never left it until two months ago, when the cable came. We were in time to see him die. My poor father!"

He touched her hand, and her fingers closed round his own convulsively.

"You oughtn't to be up here at night," he said huskily, looking at her with blinded eyes. "Didn't the man tell you that the night air was bad? And that flimsy wrap—it's no use so! Draw it across your mouth."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"What's the difference?—there, then! Shall you—will you speak to me again after this evening, or is this the last talk we shall have? I had so much to say to you, but I don't seem able to find it now you're here. If you believe that I ask your pardon on my knees, I suppose, after all, that that is everything! If ever a man deserved a good wife, it was you; I realize it more clearly than I did while we were together—though I think I knew it then. . . . You never married again?"

"No," he answered; "no, I haven't married."

"But you will, perhaps? Why haven't you?"

"I'm too old, and—I cared too much for you."

The tears were running down her face now; she loosed his hand to wipe them away.

"Don't say I've ruined your life!" she pleaded; "don't say that! My own—yes; my own—it served me right! but I've tried so hard to believe that you had got over it. When I read of your election, and then that you were made Solicitor-General, I was glad, ever so glad! I thought, 'He is successful; he has his career—his career.' I've always wanted to believe that your work was enough—that you had forgotten! It wasn't so?"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"No," he replied, "it wasn't so. I did my best to forget you, but I couldn't."

"Aunt Lydia said you weren't cut up at all when she saw you. You deceived her very well. 'A worthless woman,' you called me; I 'was not any loss'! It was quite true; but I knew you couldn't feel like that—not so soon. 'Worthless'! I've heard it every day since she told me! . . . I meant to do my duty when I married you, George; if I could have foreseen ——" She broke off, coughing. "If I could have foreseen what the end would be, I'd have killed myself rather than become your wife. I was always grateful to you; you were always good to me—and I only brought you shame!"

"Not 'only,'" he said; "you gave me happiness first, Mamie—the greatest happiness I've known! I loved you, and you came to me. You never understood how much I did love you—I think that was the trouble."

"There's a word that says it all: I worship you!' Do you remember saying that? You said it in the train when you first proposed to me. I refused you then—why did I ever give way! . . . How different everything would be now! You 'worshipped' me, and I——”

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Her voice trailed off, and once more only the pounding of the engine broke the stillness on the deck. The ocean swelled darkly under a starless sky, and Heriot sat beside her staring into space. In the steerage some one commenced to play “Robin Adair” on a fiddle. A drizzle began to fall, to blow in upon them. Heriot became conscious of it with a start. . . .

“You must go below,” he said; “it is raining.”

She rose obediently, shivering a little, and drawing the white shawl more closely about her neck.

“Good-night!” she said, standing there with wide eyes.

He put out his hand, and her clasp ran through his blood again.

“Good-night!” he repeated gently. “Sleep well.”

Was it real? Was he awake? He looked after her as she turned away—looked long after she had disappeared. The fiddle in the steerage was still scraping "Robin Adair"; the black stretch of deck was desolate. A violent impulse seized him to overtake her, to snatch her back, to hold her in his arms for once, with words and caresses of consolation. "Dying!" He wondered if Davos, Algiers, the Cape, anything and everything procurable by money, could prolong her life. Then he recollected that she had said she did not wish to live. But that was horrible! She should consult an eminent man in town, and follow his advice; he would make her promise it. With the gradual defervescence of his mood, he wondered if she was properly provided for, and resolved to question Mrs. Baines on the point. He would elicit the information he sought the following day, and something could be arranged if necessary—if not with Mamie's knowledge, then without it.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The morning was bright, and Mamie was in her chair when he came up from the saloon after breakfast. As he approached, she watched him expectantly, and it was impossible to pass without a greeting. It was impossible, when the greeting had been exchanged, not to remain with her for a few minutes.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"How are you feeling?" he asked; "any better?"

"I never feel very bad; I am just the same to-day as yesterday, thank you." The "thank you" was something more than a formula, and he felt it. It hurt him to hear the gratitude in her tone, natural as it might be.

"I want you to go to a good physician when you arrive," he said; "say to Drummond; and to do just as he tells you. You must do that; it is a duty you owe yourself."

She shrugged her shoulders. "What for? That I may last two years, perhaps, instead of one? It is kind of you to care, but I'm quite satisfied as things are. Don't bother about me."

"You will have to go!" he insisted. "Before we land I shall speak to your aunt about it."

He had paused by her seat with the intention of resuming his promenade as soon as civility permitted, but her presence was subversive of the intention. He sat down beside her as he had done the previous evening; but it was inevitable that they should now speak of other subjects than infidelity and death. The sky was blue, and the white deck glistened in the sunshine. The sea before them tumbled cheerfully, and to right and left were groups of passengers laughing, flirting, doing fancy-work, or reading novels.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"You haven't told me how it was you came to the States?" she said presently; "were you in New York all the time?"

Heriot did not answer, and she waited with surprise.

"I will tell you, if you wish," he said hastily. "I came out half meaning to marry."

"Oh!" she said, as if he had struck her.

"I thought I might be happier married," he went on. "The lady and her mother were going to New York, and I travelled with them. I—I was mistaken in myself."

They were not looking at each other any longer, and her voice trembled a little as she replied:

"You were not fond enough of her?"

"No," he said. "I shall never marry again; I told you so last night."

After a long pause, she said:

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“Was she pretty? . . . Prettier than I used to be?”

“She was handsome, I think. Not like you at all. Why talk about it? . . . I am glad I came, though, or I shouldn't have seen you. I shall always be glad to have seen you again! Remember that, after we part. For me, at least, it will never be so bitter since we've met and I've heard you say you're sorry.”

“God bless you!” she murmured almost inaudibly.

He left her after half an hour, but drifted towards her again in the afternoon. Insensibly they lost by degrees much of their constraint in talking together. She told him of her father's illness, of her own life in Balham; Heriot gave her some details of his appointment, explaining that it was the duty of an Attorney and Solicitor-General to reply to questions of law in the House, to advise the Government, and conduct its cases, and the rest of it. By Wednesday night it was difficult to him to realize that their first interview had occurred only forty-eight hours ago. It had become his habit to turn his steps towards her on deck, to sip tea by her side in the saloon, to saunter with her after dinner in the starlight. Even at last he felt no embarrassment as he moved towards her ; even at last she came to smile up at him as he drew near. Moments there could not fail to be when such a state of things seemed marvellous and unnatural—when conversation ceased, and they paused oppressed and tongue-tied by a consciousness of the anomaly of their relations. Nevertheless such moments were but hitches in an intercourse which grew daily more indispensable to them both.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

How indispensable it had become to herself the woman perceived as the end of the voyage approached ; and now she would have asked no better than for them to sail on until she died. When she undressed at night, she sighed, "Another day over" ; when she woke in the morning, eagerness quickened her pulses. On Saturday they would arrive ; and when Friday dawned, the abnormality of the reunion had less of strangeness than the reflection that she and Heriot would separate again directly. To think that, as a matter of course, they would say good-bye to each other, and resume their opposite sides of an impassable gulf, looked more unnatural to her than the renewed familiarity.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Their pauses were longer than usual on Friday evening. Both were remembering that it was the last. Heriot had ascertained that Cheriton had been able to leave her but little; and the notion of providing her with the means to winter in some favourable climate was hot in his mind.

"It is understood," he said abruptly, "that you go to Drummond, and do exactly as he orders? You will not be so mad as to refuse at the last moment?"

"All right!" she answered apathetically, "I will go. Shall I—will you care to hear what he says?"

"Your aunt has promised to write to me. By the way, there's something I want to say to-night. If what he advises is expensive, you must let me make it possible for you. I claim that as my right. I intended arranging it with Mrs. Baines, but she tells me you—you would be bound to know where the money came from. He will probably tell you to live abroad."

ONE MAN'S VIEW

"Thank you!" she said after a slight start; "I could not take your money. It is very good of you, but I would rather you didn't speak of it. If you talked for ever, I wouldn't consent!"

"Mamie——"

"The very offer turns me cold. Please don't!"

"You are cruel," he said. "You are refusing to let me prolong your life. Have I deserved that from you?"

"Oh!" she cried, in a tortured voice, "for God's sake, don't press me! Leave me something—I won't say 'self-respect,' but a vestige, a grain of proper pride! Think what my feelings would be living on money from you—it would not prolong my life, George; it would kill me sooner! You have been generous and merciful to me; be merciful to me still, and talk of something else."

"You are asking me to stand by and see you die. I have feelings, too! Mamie, I can't do it!"

"I am dying," she said; "if it happens a little sooner or a little later, does it matter very greatly? If you want to be very kind to me, to

ONE MAN'S VIEW

—to brighten the time that remains as much as you can, tell me that if I send to you when—when it's a question of days, you will come to the place and see me again. I would bless you for that! I've been afraid to ask you till now; but it would mean more to me than anything else you could do. Would you, if I sent?"

"Why," said Heriot labouredly, after another pause, "why would it mean so much?"

They were leaning over the taffrail; and suddenly her head was bent, and she broke into convulsive sobs that tore his breast.

"Mamie!" he exclaimed. "Mamie, tell me!" He glanced around, and laid a trembling touch upon her hands. "Tell me, dear!" he repeated hoarsely. "Do you love me, then?"

Her figure was shaken by the shuddering breaths. His touch upon her tightened to a clasp; he drew the hands down from the distorted face, drew the shaken figure closer, till his own met it—till her bosom was heaving against his heart.

"Do you love me, Mamie?"

"Yes!" she gasped. And then for an instant only their eyes spoke, and in the intensity of their eyes each gave to the other body and soul.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“ I love you ! ” she panted ; “ it’s my punishment, I suppose, to love you too late ! I shall never see you after to-morrow, till I am dying—if then—but I love you. Remember it ! It’s no good to you, you won’t care, but remember it, because it’s my punishment. You can say, ‘ When it was too late, she knew ! She died detesting herself, shrinking at her own body, her own loathsome body that she gave to another man ! ’ Oh ”—she beat her hands hysterically against his chest—“ I hate him, I hate him ! God forgive me, he’s in his grave, but I hate him when I think what’s been ! And it wasn’t his fault ; it was mine, mine—my own degraded, beastly self ! Curse me, throw me from you ! I’m not fit to be standing here ; I’m lower than the lowest woman in the streets ! ”

The violence of her emotion maddened him. He knew that he, too, loved her ; the truth was stripped of the disguise in which he had sought for years to wrap it—he knew that he had never ceased to love her ; and a temptation to make her his wife again, to cherish and possess her so long as life should linger in her veins, flooded his reason. Their gaze grew wider, deeper still; he could feel her quivering from head to foot. Another moment, and he would have offered his honour to her keeping afresh. Some men left the smoking-room; there was the sharp interruption of laughter—the slam of the door. They both regained some semblance of self-possession as they moved apart.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

“I must go down,” she said. And he did not beg her to remain.

It was their real farewell, for on the morrow they could merely exchange a few words amid the bustle of arrival. Liverpool was reached early in the morning, and when Heriot saw her, she wore a hat and veil, and was already prepared to go ashore. In the glare of the sunshine the veil could not conceal that her eyes were red with weeping, however, and he divined that she had passed a sleepless night. To Mrs. Baines he privately repeated his injunctions with regard to the physician, for he was determined to have his way; and the widow assured him that she would write to Morson Drummond for an appointment without loss of time. The delays and shouts came to an end, and the gangway was lowered while he was speaking to her, and Mamie moved forward to her side. He saw the pair again in the custom-house, but for a minute only, and from a distance. They evidently got through without trouble, for when he looked across again, they were gone.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

A sensation of blankness fell upon Heriot's mood as he perceived it, where he stood waiting amid the scattered luggage. His life felt newly empty, and the day all at once seemed cold and dark.

CHAPTER XIV

THE truth was stripped of the disguise in which he had sought to wrap it; he knew that he had never ceased to love her. As he had known it while she sobbed beside him on the boat, so he knew it when the Bar claimed him again, and he wrestled with temptation amid his work. He might re-marry her! He could not drive this irruptive idea from his mind. It lurked there, impelled attention, dozed, woke, and throbbed in his consciousness persistently. Were he but weak enough to make the choice, the woman he loved might belong to him once more.

Were he but weak enough! There were minutes in which he was very near to it, minutes in which the dishonour, if dishonour it were, looked as nothing to him compared with the joy of having her for his wife again. Yet were he but "weak" enough? Would it indeed be weakness—would it not rather be strength, the courage of his convictions? The noetic longing illumined his vision, and he asked himself on what his doubt and hesitation was based. She had sinned; but he had pardoned her sin, not merely in words, but in his heart. And she was very dear to him; and she had repented. Then why should it be impossible? What after all had they done to her, what change in the beloved identity had they wrought, those months that were past? He was aware that it was the physical side that repelled him—there had been another man. Yet if she had been a widow when he met her first, there would have been another man, and it would have mattered nothing! Did this especial sin make of a woman somebody else? Did it give to her another face, another form, another brain? Did unfaithfulness transform her personality? The only difference was the knowledge of what had happened—the woman herself was the same! But he would not vindicate his right to love her—he loved her, that was enough. In its simplicity the question was whether he would do better to condone her guilt, and know happiness, or to preserve his dignity, and suffer. He could not blink the question ; it confronted him nakedly when a week had worn by. Without her he was lonely and wretched ; with her, while she lived, he was confident that his joy would be supreme. The step that he considered was, it any one pleased, revolting ; but if it led to his contentment, perhaps to be "revolting" might be height of wisdom. He must sacrifice his pride or his peace ; and at last, quite deliberately, without misgiving or a backward glance, Heriot determined to gain peace.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

ONE MAN'S VIEW

A few days after the arrival, Mrs. Baines had written to inform him that the physician was out of town, but now a line came to say that an appointment had been made for "Monday," and that she would communicate Dr. Drummond's pronouncement immediately they reached home after the interview. It was on Monday morning that Heriot received the note, and he resolved to go to Mamie the same evening.

The thought of the amazement that his appearance would produce in her excited him wildly as he drove to Victoria. He could foresee the wonder in her eyes as he entered, the incredulity on her features as she heard what he was there to say; and the profoundest satisfaction pervaded him that he had resolved to say it. The comments that his world would make had no longer any place in his meditations; a fico for the world that would debar him from delight, and censure what it could not understand! He had suffered long enough; his only regret was for the years which had been lost before he grasped the vivid truth that, innocent or guilty, the woman who conferred happiness was the woman to be desired.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

A criticism of his brother's recurred to him: "You hadn't a single taste in common!" He had not disputed it at the time; he was not certain that he could deny it now. But there was no need to consider whether their views were kindred or opposed, whether she was defiled or stainless, when she was the woman whose magic could transfigure his existence. He was conscious that this marriage to be approved by his judgment, and condemned by Society, would be a sweeter and holier union than their first, to which she had brought purity and indifference. As the cab sped down Victoria Street, his excitement increased, and in imagination he already clasped her, and felt the warmth of her cheek against his face. He felt the softness of her hair between his fingers, and stinging his lips, as he smoothed and kissed it as he had done five years ago.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

The hansom slackened, jerked to a standstill, and he leapt out, and hurried to the booking-office. A train was on the point of starting. The sentiment of the bygone was quick in him as he found that he must pass through a yellow barrier on to the same platform to which he had been wont to hasten in the period when he used to go to see her in Lavender Street, Wandsworth. He had never trodden it since. A thousand associations, sad but delicious, were revived as he took his seat, and the guard, whose countenance struck him as familiar, sauntered with a green flag and a lantern past the window. Victoria slipped back. It had been in one of these compartments—perhaps in this one!—that he had first asked her to be his wife.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

How damp she had been! he remembered that her cape was quite wet when he touched it. A porter sang out, "Grosvenor Road," and at the sound of it Heriot marvelled he should have forgotten that they were about to stop there. Yes, "Grosvenor Road," and then — what next? He could not recollect; but memory knocked with a louder pang as each of the impossible places on the line was reached. When the name of Wandsworth Common was cried, he glanced out at the dimly-lighted station, while in fancy he traced the course to the shabby villa that had been her home. He thought he could find it blindfold.

After Wandsworth the line was quite strange to him; and now the impatience of his mood had no admixture, and he merely trembled with eagerness to gain his destination.

"Balham!" was bawled two minutes later, and among a stream of clerks and nondescripts, he descended a flight of steps and emerged into a narrow street. No cabs were in attendance, and, having obtained directions, he pursued his way to Rosalie Road on foot.

A glimpse he had of cheap commerce, of the flare of gas-jets on oranges, and eggs, and fifth-rate millinery; and then the shops and the masses were left behind, and he was in obscurity. The ring of footsteps occurred but seldom here, and he wandered vainly in a maze of little houses for half an hour before a welcome postman earned a shilling.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Rosalie Road began in darkness, and ended in a brickfield. Heriot identified Number 44 by the aid of a vesta. A hollow jangle succeeded his pull at the bell, and presently, through the panes in the door, he could discern a figure advancing along the passage.

His throat appeared to contract, and his voice sounded strange in his ears, as he inquired if Mamie was within.

"Yessir; she's in the drorin'-room," replied the drudge. "Oo shall I say?"

"Sir George Heriot. Is Mrs. Baines at home?"

His title rendered her incapable of immediate response.

"Missis is out of a herrandt, sir," she stammered, recovering herself; "she won't be long."

"When she comes in, tell her that I'm talking privately to her niece. Privately; don't forget!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

She turned the handle, and Heriot followed her into the room. He heard her announce him, but vaguely. He saw the room as in a mist. Momentarily all that was clear was Mamie's face, white and wonder-stricken in the lamplight. She stood where she had been standing at his entrance, looking at him; he had the impression of many minutes passing while she only looked. A long time seemed to go by before her colour fluttered back, and she said, "You?"

"Yes, it's I," he said. "Won't you say you're glad to see me?"

"Aunt Lydia has written to you," she murmured, still gazing at him as if she doubted his reality. "Her letter has gone."

"I have come to hear what Dr. Drummond says."

She motioned him to a chair, and drooped weakly on to the shiny couch herself.

"I am not going to die," she said, moistening her lips. "Your sympathy has been thrown away. I am a fraud!"

ONE MAN'S VIEW

In the tenseness of the pause in which he waited, the tumultuous throbbing of his heart seemed to shake it in his breast.

"He has given you hope?" he asked, articulating at last.

"He said, 'Bosh!' I told him what the doctor declared in Duluth. He said, 'Bosh!' One lung isn't sound, that's all. I may live to be eighty."

"O dear God!" said Heriot slowly, "how I thank You!"

She gave a short laugh, harsh and bitter.

"I always posed. My last pose was as a dying woman!"

"Mamie," he said firmly—he went across to her and sat down by her side—"Mamie, I love you! I want you to come back to me, my dearest! My life's no good without you, and I want you for my wife again. Will you come?"

He heard her catch her breath, but she could not speak. He took her hands, and drew her to him. She fell upon his neck, and their mouths clung together, and presently he felt hot tears on his cheek.

ONE MAN'S VIEW

Then she released herself with a gesture of negation.

"You are mad!" she said. "And I should be madder to accept the sacrifice!"

For this he was prepared.

"I am very sane," he answered. "When you understand, you will see that it is the only reparation you can make me. Listen!"

THE END

NOVELS BY LEONARD MERRICK.

VIOLET MOSES.

SATURDAY REVIEW.—How it has fared with the Jew in modern fiction is a theme that should one day be treated by some philosophic writer. When the hour arrives, that writer cannot possibly afford to neglect Mr. Leonard Merrick's Violet Moses. There is not the least suggestion of racial sentiment or of imperfect sympathies in Mr. Merrick's clever sketches of Jewish society in the cool, sequestered Maida Vale of life. The Jew that George Eliot drew is more gratifying to the romantic eye than Mr. Leopold Moses, but the latter is unquestionably the more persuasive portraiture. Mr. Moses possesses everything—even to flesh and blood—that Mr. Deronda lacked.

ATHENÆUM.—Whether Maida Vale will be gratified or not by extremely vivid portraiture may be open to doubt; but certainly the circles to which Leopold Moses, financier, introduces a very sensitive and intelligent young wife will have the charm of novelty to most of those who share the introduction.

THE TIMES.—The author is fairly entitled to the honours of a discoverer. He has struck down into a new social stratum, and he seems to be at home in it.

JEWISH CHRONICLE.—The right way to deal with a book of this kind is not to shriek at it as a libel—which it is not—but to profit by the salutary lesson that it teaches.

THE MAN WHO WAS GOOD.

SPECTATOR.—There was enough cleverness in Violet Moses—that brilliant and cynical study of middle-class Jewish life—to excite interest in its author's future. . . . Here we are allowed a glimpse, and something more than a glimpse, of heights of aspiration and attainment. . . . With the entrance into the story of Dr. Kincaid, we begin to breathe a clearer, sweeter atmosphere than that of the drawing-rooms of Maida Vale.

SATURDAY REVIEW.—Mr. Leonard Merrick is distinguished in the school of fiction to which he belongs. His talent is rare, and what the French mean by fine.

ATHENÆUM.—The Man who was Good is one of a cluster of simultaneous novels, all turning on the self-abandonment of a woman, more or less complete, for a man who proves to be unworthy of the sacrifice. The main justification of such a central incident consists in the treatment of the woman's attitude after she has discovered that her idol is but iron and clay. Most of the novels now referred to are written by women, as might seem to be natural, since the question is one of the interpretation of sexual predispositions. But the author of Violet Moses, who has already shown himself an exceptionally acute observer, probably comes as near to the truth in his example of the eternal paradox as any woman has done.

THIS STAGE OF FOOLS.

SPEAKER.—Mr. Leonard Merrick possesses that thrice-blessed gift—the power of interesting his readers. In This Stage of Fools he proves from cover to cover his grasp of that essential quality of the novelist's mental equipment. The volume is mainly a réchauffé of short stories and sketches which have already appeared in various magazines, though the first and most important contribution, The Laurels and the Lady, is printed for the first time in these pages. But all alike justify their appearance in volume form by virtue of their excellent technique, bold treatment, and originality of idea. Unconventional as Mr. Merrick is in his methods of dealing with our social scheme, his is by no means that kind of unconventionality which, in recent novels, has so often shown itself allied with a hectic and almost hysterical morbidness. He has, happily for his readers, no desire to thrust upon them fantastic theories of existence. Artistic enough to paint life as he sees it, he is also imaginative enough to see in it those dumb tragedies of emotion which are not visible to the casual onlooker. The polished style in which it is written is not the smallest merit in this remarkably clever and suggestive volume.

THE TABLET.—The keenness of observation and power of drawing womanly strength in Violet Moses, the intensity, the emotional charm and pathos, of The Man who was Good; the fidelity of his pictures, the absence of exaggeration, the simplicity, the insight into human nature of both books, are all in This Stage of Fools, but in miniature. Still, Mr. Merrick has done himself an injustice by his title. Violet Moses was a cynical study, but these sketches are written, not like Rabelais, with his finger by his nose; nor like Balzac, with his tongue in his cheek; not like Carlyle, with his back upon humanity; nor like Heine, with lips tightened and drawn. In this book, at least, Mr. Merrick has too warm a pulse to be a satirist; it is too full of the rich blood of life for him to feel—whatever he thinks—that men are “mostly fools.” Of course they are; but his sense of a situation, his gift of dramatic effect, his power of touching very sensitive chords with a fine hand, carry us past the veil of folly to the tragedies that breathe beyond. The wine of life may be, as it is, sour, but he sweetens it in presenting the cup.

CYNTHIA, A DAUGHTER OF THE PHILISTINES.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—A book that starts upon a good literary level, and maintains it to the end; that never for a moment degenerates into the slipshod or the sloshy; is a thing of comfort and joy to the reviewer—so much so, in fact, that he has to be on his guard against the temptation to praise it unduly. Such a book is Cynthia. Mr. Merrick is an author with a conscience. He writes with the feeling full upon him that he has a duty to perform to the reader; that a few smart dialogues, a little bit of clever characterisation here and there, a few wise remarks in propria persona, are insufficient to what should be a serious work of art. But good conscience is not Mr. Merrick's only qualification for his art; he has all sorts of others: observation, knowledge of life, humour, a turn for neat phrasing, an eye for the essential, and a clear recognition of development as a factor in human character.

THE WORLD.—The story of a novelist by a novelist is likely to prove interesting, because there must inevitably be something real and characteristic in it, and here we have that interest developed by genuine ability, humour, a good style, and a clever plot.

Mr. Grant Richards's New Books.

READY IMMEDIATELY.

Vernon Lee's New Book.

LIMBO, and other Essays. By VERNON LEE, Author of "Euphorion," "Althea," etc. Fcap. 8vo, buckram, 3s. 6d. net. With Frontispiece.

A Novel Cookery Book.

CAKES AND ALE: A Memory of Many Meals; with Recipes more or less Original, and Anecdotes mostly Veracious. By EDWARD SPENCER ("Nathaniel Gubbins"). With Cover designed by PHIL MAY. Small 4to, cloth, 5s.

G. B. Burgin's New Novel.

"OLD MAN'S" MARRIAGE: A NOVEL. By G. B. BURGIN, Author of "The Judge of the Four Covers," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

NOW READY.

By Edward Clodd.

PIONEERS OF EVOLUTION FROM THALES TO HUXLEY.

By EDWARD CLODD, Author of "The Story of Creation," "The Childhood of the World," etc. With Photogravure Portraits of Charles Darwin, Professor Huxley, Mr. A. R. Wallace, and Mr. Herbert Spencer. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

The ACADEMY: "Mr. Clodd's is probably the first attempt that has been made to estimate Huxley among his peers. It has succeeded excellently. . . . Altogether the book could hardly be better done. It is luminous, lucid, orderly, and temperate."

Grant Allen's Historical Guides: The First Two Volumes.

PARIS and FLORENCE. By GRANT ALLEN. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each, net.

"I desire to supply the tourist who wishes to use his travels as a means of culture with such historical and antiquarian information as will enable him to understand, and therefore to enjoy, the architecture, sculpture, painting and minor arts of the towns he visits."—Extract from the Introduction to the Series.

A New Annual.

POLITICS IN 1896: An Annual, containing Contributions by H. D. TRAILL, H. W. MASSINGHAM, GEORGE BERNARD SHAW, H. W. WILSON, G. W. STEEVENS, Capt. MAUDE, ALBERT SHAW and ROBERT DONALD. Small crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. net.

The TIMES says: "May be welcomed as a useful contribution to the literature of contemporary history."

Mr. KEIR HARDIE says in The LABOUR LEADER:—"Those who can afford it—which includes at least every Labour Club—ought to possess a copy for their library."

LONDON: GRANT RICHARDS, 9, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

u/s

2436

